By Mr. McClintic:

Q. There is an item called "Fugitive Slave Fund," $5,201. Do you know what that was?

A. The charges to that account are in the nature of rewards for the capture of fugitive slaves.

Q. You have no charge on your exhibit of that account, have you?

Mr. Conrad: Nothing was more ordinary and usual than that.

The Special Master: You have no topic of that character, have you?

The Witness: No; I do not remember any.

The Special Master: Are you looking now to see whether 773 it is included in any other item.

The Witness: Yes. We include it in Exhibit D-1, page 6, an expenditure under the title, "Rewards," $13,992.64, which is for the apprehension of fugitives and criminals.

The Special Master: And does that probably include this item of $5,201?

The Witness: It probably does, yes, sir.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Going to the next item, land sold in 1855, $8.48. Do you recall anything about that?

A. I do not recall that item.

Q. Under the title "Public printing," there is $23,092.31. Do you include that under that head or some other head?

A. We have the same head, page 5 of Defendant's Exhibit D-1.

Q. The next item is "Claims under 27th and 45th Chapter Code of Virginia, $1,344.05." Do you know what that is?

A. I do not.

The Special Master: That is not rewards, is it?

The Witness: I could not tell.

Mr. Conrad: You could not tell without reference to the Code.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. The next item to which I call your attention is Treasury Note expenses, $375.45. Do you allow that in your exhibit?

A. We do not allow it.

Q. Do you know what it is? 774

A. It is for printing treasury notes.

The Special Master: Printing what?

The Witness: Printing Treasury notes, the notes themselves, the expense connected with printing the notes.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. That is, Virginia State money?

A. That is Virginia State money.

Q. The next item is "Tax on dividends, $128.50." Do you remember what that is?

A. I cannot say that I remember that particular item, but I am under the impression that it is a refund.

Q. If it was a refund it had no business as a charge here, had it?

A. No, sir.

Q. (Reading): "Arms and munitions of War, $4,111.13." Do you know what that is?

A. That is an expense on account of the early wars, 1812 and 1814, and is not included in our account.

Q. The next is "Survey of Washington's birth place, $139.21." What have you to say about that?

A. That title is self explanatory and we have not included that in the account.

Q. That was not an ordinary expense?

A. No, sir.

Mr. Harrison: Why did you not include it?

The Witness: We did not include it—

Mr. McClintic: If you will allow me to answer, I will say that he did not include it because we instructed him not to 775 include it.

Mr. Conrad: The thing had to be a recurring expense to be an ordinary expense.

The Special Master: That is the position they took, I suppose.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. The next item is "temporary clerks in auditor's office, $3,826.64." Is that taken care of in your account somewhere?

A. I think it is.

Mr. Conrad: If these two experts had gotten together they could have avoided a lot of this examination.

The Witness: (After looking over papers.) I have that impressed very strongly on my mind, but I cannot locate it.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. The next item is "marking Virginia and Maryland Boundary, $6,094.44." Do you include that anywhere?

A. No, sir.

Mr. Harrison: Why not?

A. Under instruction of counsel.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. The next item is maps, $11,400.90. Is that charged in your account?

A. It is not.

Mr. Conrad: What is that,—Maps?

The Witness: Yes, sir.

Mr. Conrad: Published by the State for public use throughout the limits of the entire Commonwealth.

Mr. Harrison: When were those maps published, if you know?

The Witness: I am not able to tell when they were published. I can tell when the money was expended. 776

Mr. Harrison: They were published in 1825, 1826, 1827 and 1828, were they not?

Mr. Conrad: They were, and they were published for the use of the entire Commonwealth.

The Witness: The dates you give are correct—1825, 1826, 1827 and 1828; that is the date of the expenditure of the money.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. Have you got that same figure in that account?

The Witness: $11,397.24. It is not in our account.

Q. The expenditure is correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And not included in your account on direction of counsel?

The Witness: Yes.

The Special Master: What is the item; "maps?"

Mr. Conrad: For maps which were published and circulated all over the Commonwealth.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. The next item is public arms, $11,499.97. Is that included in this?

A. We have included the charges for public arms in Defendant's Exhibit D-1, page 5; the amount that we charge there on the military establishment, public arms, pay roll at armory, and so forth, $21,609.30. I think we have combined another account with 777 this account.

Q. The next item is State Convention, $258,677.40. Have you included that?

A. It is not included in any of our exhibits.

Mr. Harrison: That expenditure was made, was it not?

Mr. McClintic: What was it?

Mr. Harrison: It was for the State Convention of 1829-1830 and 1850-1851.

Mr. Spooner: Constitutional conventions?

Mr. Harrison: State constitutional conventions, yes.

The Special Master: Two different Constitutional Conventions?

Mr. Harrison: Yes, sir.

Mr. McClintic: You had one in 1864, too, did you not? You had one at Alexandria?

Mr. Harrison: Yes, there was Pierpont and two or three others there.

Mr. McClintic: There were seventeen people there.

Mr. Harrison: That money was expended, was it not, for the Conventions of 1829-30 and 1850-51?

The Special Master: These conventions are apparently as regular as the eruption of a volcano.

Mr. Harrison: There were two ex-Presidents of the United States in that first convention, and Chief Justice Marshall.

Mr. Spooner: Is that why it was so expensive?

Mr. Harrison: No, but it was a famous assemblage of men.

Mr. Spooner: Oh, yes, it was an extraordinary convention.

Mr. Anderson: It cost about one fourth as much as the convention of 1850-51. 778

The Witness: There was expended $258,906.28 in the years 1830 and 1851-52.

Mr. Harrison: And you did not include that?

The Witness: No, under instructions of counsel.

Mr. McClintic: The next item is "Medical College, $25,000." Did you include that item?

A. No, sir. It was on account of construction at Richmond.

Mr. Harrison: Construction of buildings?

The Witness: I don't know what was constructed.

The Special Master: Which is the item?

Mr. McClintic: Medical College, $25,000.

Mr. Harrison: You do not include that item in your statement?

The Witness: It was not included.

Mr. Harrison: I suppose for the same reason.

The Witness: For the same reason; the instructions of counsel.

Mr. McClintic: And that was for construction, you said, in Richmond.

Mr. Harrison: He said he didn't know what it was for.

The Witness: I said it was for construction in Richmond.

Mr. Conrad: For construction?

The Witness: Yes, sir.

Mr. Conrad: I thought you were asked the question 779 whether it was for a building and you said you didn't know whether it was a building or not.

Mr. McClintic: The next item is "Experimental Railroad, $10,000." Please tell us where that was constructed.

The Witness: There was expended on account of the experimental railroad, $6,000 in accordance with an act passed March 31, 1850, page 15, for an experimental railroad not exceeding two miles in length between the depot of Richmond and Petersburg railroad, and the depot of Richmond and Fredericksburg Railroad, and between such other points as the Board of Public Works may select, furnishing engines and other necessities.

Mr. Conrad: That is not embraced in your account?

The Witness: It is not.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. The next item is Blair and Bolling, special service, $200. Do you know what that is?

A. The item is very familiar, but I shall have to look further before I can answer.

Q. You do not include it in your account, do you?

A. I cannot tell whether I do or not without further examination of these detail figures.

Mr. McClintic: If the court please, it is now twenty minutes after ten o'clock, and I will not be able to finish this witness to-night.

The Special Master: I hoped you would be able to get through.

Mr. McClintic: There are two schedules besides this one to examine him about.

Mr. Harrison: Are you going to go through those in the 780 same way that you are going through this one?

Mr. McClintic: This is the only way I know to get the information I want to in regard to these items.

The Special Master: Of course I do not want to direct counsel as to how they should conduct this examination, but I think probably seven or eight of these items would be reconciled by the accountants if they could get together and go over them. If the others are of the same character, I see no reason why they should not have a try at it, and then if there are any others that they cannot agree on we can take those up.

Mr. McClintic: What I want to do is to get something in the record, so we can make our arguments on it.

The Special Master: Probably one-half or two-thirds of these items have not got to be examined by the experts; this witness will probably have to examine that proportion of them to find out whether he included them in other charges. Perhaps I am putting the proportion too high when I say two-thirds, but I will say a great many of them. All of this could be done by the experts themselves, and they could agree on a great many of the items. Of course, here is your State Convention; that is an item about which you would have a controversy. But there are a great many other items which the experts could probably agree on.

Mr. McClintic: I would like to have a statement of the witness as to what they represent, more than the way it is stated here.

The Special Master: Take this Blair Bolling special ser- 781 vice, $200. If it turns out that is included, you do not care anything about it.

Mr. McClintic: I want to say, your Honor, that this proposition inviting us to work with the experts of the other State is an entirely new proposition to me.

The Special Master: If the other schedules are practically like these, there is no reason why the experts should not dispose of nearly all the items. That will not bind either one of you as to whether the items shall be in or out, but they can tell whether the items here appear in your account under another name.

Mr. McClintic: In connection with that, I want some explanation as to what the items are.

The Special Master: This witness it seems has not had an opportunity to examine the schedule. All he has testified to is from his general recollection.

Mr. Spooner. In some respects that has been pretty definite.

The Special Master: It has been definite in some cases, but on the whole not very satisfactory.

Mr. Harrison: All we want is to have your expert confer with ours and let them see what progress they can make in disposing of many of these items.

Mr. McClintic: We do not want the experts to decide this case, however; we will want to argue it.

The Special Master: The experts will not decide the ques- 782 tion; but the question arises, is this item included, or is that item included, and as to a great many of them the experts are able to tell. As to others, the witness cannot remember. That is very natural, of course he cannot remember. It is a physical impossibility for him to remember, it is asking too much of him. As I say, he can recall with regard to some of these items as to whether they are included or not, but as to others, he has to make an examination in connection with a lot of these items before he can make a statement which is satisfactory. Of course, when he says he thinks it is in or thinks it is not in, that goes for nothing with me; it is either in or out, and it can be ascertained, and he will have to take the time as to a lot of these items, to say certainly whether they are included or not. So, so long as it is understood that the experts are going to get together and go over these items and see if they can agree as to a lot of them, it seems to me we are not gaining very much now by going over this. If there is an item here that Mr. Dixey has been instructed to leave out, it will be left out, of course; he will not consent to its going in. Then if the plaintiffs claim that it ought to go in, I will hear their argument on that.

Mr. McClintic: I want the information more definite as to what the items are.

The Special Master: When we get them weeded down as to the items of controversy, of course I want on the record the facts in relation to those items, so I can take the facts and your argument, and weigh your argument according to the facts; and the experts among themselves can work out these details. So far as 783 they disagree, that will be entirely open to explanation, and to the production of any facts necessary; but you will be in a much better position to put your facts in when you know what they are than you are now.

Mr. McClintic: I realize that.

[Vol. 7. July 1, 1909. Plaintiff's Revised Exhibit D-1.]

[The Special Master]: Now, we will proceed under Paragraph 4.

Mr. Anderson: I have here schedule D-1.

The Special Master: The plaintiffs submit substitute schedule D-1. Is that agreed upon as to the computations?

(The exhibit referred to was filed with the stenographer and marked "Plaintiff's Revised Exhibit D-1.")

Mr. Anderson (replying to the Special Master): Not in all 839 details.

Mr. McClintic: That, as I understand it, Mr. Dixey has not had time to go over and check up. It was handed to him on yesterday, and he did not have time to finish it.

The Special Master: Then we will make more progress by laying that aside.

Mr. Dixey: There is an admitted discrepancy there of almost $50,000.

The Special Master: Is that in any one item or several items?

Mr. Dixey: We do not know.

The Special Master: Then shall we lay that aside for the present?

Mr. Dixey: I would rather have you take Mr. Potter's say on that.

The Special Master: The only question I am interested in is whether all the items in this schedule are agreed upon. I understand that they are not.

Mr. Dixey: That is correct.

The Special Master: Now, the next question is whether the experts will get together and make an effort to reach an agreement.

Mr. Harrison: Might it not facilitate matters for your Honor to go ahead and ascertain what are agreed upon? Take this fourth schedule, which relates to the ordinary expenses of the State government, and leaving out the classification and referring only to the question of the amounts of the ordinary expenses, extending over the thirty-seven years involved, there is only a difference, as I understand it, of $50,000. 840

The Special Master: Well, if the experts themselves can get together and settle that, it saves the time of something like ten or fifteen men.

Mr. Carlisle: Is the difference of $50,000 in the total amount, and not a difference of $50,000 in West Virginia's part of it?

Mr. Harrison: It is a case of the amount, no matter what you do with it.

The Special Master: It is immaterial to me. Now, here is $50,000. If you want to reconcile the $50,000 between yourselves, in connection with this schedule, and the experts have gone over it for the purpose of reaching that result—

Mr. Harrison: The difficulty about referring that to the experts to reconcile is that it means a very considerable expenditure of time and labor in running down the items that compose that $50,000, to see what they are.

The Special Master: Let me ask you this. Suppose you put it up to me to settle? Have I not got to run it down the same way? And then six or seven men on each side have to listen to it. Is it not better to let two men take it and try to settle it if they can?

Mr. Anderson: I wished to find out where it was. It may be we will be able to adjust it.

The Special Master: That is my suggestion, that the experts take it up. I am willing to stay here—of course if you do not agree, I am willing to stay here and hear the controversy between all the parties; but my own notion about it is that if there are items of disagreement in this $50,000 and you do not agree to eliminate it among yourselves, that the experts had better make an 841 effort to agree before we take the time of the experts and the time of all counsel to go into the matter fully.

Mr. Anderson: I hope that counsel will be able to eliminate it.

The Special Master: Very well. It it immaterial to me whether the agreement is reached between the counsel or between the experts. Here is the point—

Mr. Anderson: They have been working on that for six weeks, and they have not been able to find out what those accounts are.

The Special Master: That is going to be the question, whether I will have to sit here and listen to the experts on both sides—

Mr. Anderson: That is the reason I suggest we postpone it.

The Special Master: Very well; and not take the time of the Master and all the counsel on either side, unless it appears that the counsel are not able to agree after the experts put in their work and ascertain what the disagreement is. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. Harrison: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Then we will spend no further time on Plaintiff's Substitute Exhibit D-1.

[Vol. 7. July 1, 1909. As to Introduction of Further Evidence.]

The Special Master: Then we come to D-1, Plaintiff Revised Exhibit D-1. There the experts, I think, have some computations to make. Have you any evidence to submit in relation to D-1, other than what is in the record?

Mr. Harrison: No other than what is embodied in our schedule.

The Special Master: Unless it should appear that the experts are not able to agree, in which case you would have to submit to me, I suppose, the items of disagreement for me to decide. Have you anything to submit, either of you, under the fourth paragraph, Plaintiff's Exhibit D-1?

Mr. Carlisle: That relates to what?

The Special Master (reading from decree):

"Such proportion of the ordinary expenses of the Government of Virginia since any of said debt was contracted as was properly assignable to the counties which were created into the State of West Virginia on the basis of the average total population of the State of Virginia, with and without slaves, as shown by the Census of the United States."

As to Plaintiff's Substitute Exhibit D-1, paragraph 4 of the Decree, unless the experts are unable to agree on some item now in controversy, there is no additional testimony to be submitted by either side. Am I correct? 876

Mr. McClintic: Unless there is something overlooked.

The Special Master: I want this distinctly understood. I think I have already stated it a number of times. This hearing is not going to be conducted on the basis of snap judgment against either of you. At the last moment, as far as that is concerned, if either party finds it has left out anything which it thinks seriously or materially affects its rights, I will open the report and see that it goes in. I want to make a report only after having given both parties full opportunity to have all their contentions heard, and if I am satisfied you have left out anything at any time, as I say, I will open the case.

Mr. Harrison: We have nothing in addition to that except what may be explanatory.

The Special Master: In case the experts agree, you have not any additional testimony?

Mr. Anderson: Not as to the amounts, but as to the facts.

Mr. Harrison: That is, in the character of classification.

The Special Master: But until you get the result from the experts, you would not be in a position to go on?

Mr. Harrison: No, sir.

The Special Master: Then, for the purpose of the hearing right now, we will pass paragraph 4.

[Vol. 7. July 1. 1909. Relating to Differences in Schedules.]

[Mr. Dixey]: I think it will be very much longer than Saturday morning before an analysis could be made of the ordinary expenses and an agreement reached on that.

Mr. Anderson: What is the discrepancy; what is the amount of it?

Mr. Dixey: The balance is about $42,000, but there may be hundreds of thousands of dollars involved in that, and we cannot tell until we make the analysis.

The Special Master: How could there be hundreds of thousands of dollars involved, if there is only a difference of $42,000?

Mr. Dixey: Because you have charges and credits each way, 893 and the difference is only $42,000.

Mr. Anderson: Do you stand by your original schedule? Defendant's Exhibit D-1.

Mr. Dixey: We are here now I understand, for the purpose of reconciling these things. If any errors develop in the course of the analysis, we shall of course want to correct them

Mr. Potter: It will take two months to make an analysis of that account item by item.

The Special Master: There is $42,000 in controversy. The plaintiffs charge you with $42,000 more than you think they ought to.

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir.

Mr. Anderson: We will accept West Virginia's total rather than have any trouble about that.

The Special Master: Rather than have any trouble about that, Virginia waives that $42,000.

Mr. Anderson: I mean as to that $42,000. We have other figures about which there can be no controversy as to the amount.

Mr. Dixey: That is just the point.

The Special Master: Mr. Dixey's contention is this: That he finds it difficult, I suppose, to apply to any particular item the descrepancy that there may be; is that it?

Mr. Dixey: That is it; that that $42,000 is unlocated.

The Special Master: That is, if it is applied to one item the result may be one thing, and if it is applied to another item the result may be another, and if applied to another still another thing.

Mr. Anderson: I call attention to the fact that I think he is 894 mistaken, because these items have been agreed upon between Mr. Dixey and Mr. Potter; everything has been agreed upon except a discrepancy in the totals of $42,000, and we are willing to accept West Virginia's totals.

Mr. Dixey: I do not know that at this time.

Mr. Anderson: I will read them to you.

Mr. Dixey: Even then I cannot identify them from memory.

Mr. Anderson: I think you can.

Mr. Dixey: No, I cannot. I have had it and gone over it.

Mr. Anderson: Certainly Mr. Scoville can.

Mr. Dixey: Unfortunately Mr. Scoville is ill and is not here.

Mr. Anderson: There is no question that it has been agreed upon between the accountants as to these items between Virginia and West Virginia.

Mr. Dixey: I have not agreed upon that.

The Special Master: Of course the agreement that I ultimately recognize is the agreement between counsel for Virginia and counsel for West Virginia.

Mr. Anderson: I said that they had been agreed upon between the accountants.

The Special Master: In the face of Mr. Dixey's statement that it has not been made, I cannot hold that an agreement has been reached. I cannot report they agree when they do not agree.

Here is the condition that confronts. Here is Mr. Dixey, who 895 is a responsible accountant for West Virginia, and if he tells me that he does not agree, even if he has heretofore agreed and withdraws that agreement—although of course I do not suggest that that is the fact—I would not be able to hold that an agreement was reached.

Mr. Anderson: Well, we are prepared to prove these items, and by incontrovertible evidence.

The Special Master: I know you are. We have all thought that rather than take the time of all of us by taking your proof and their proof and having me pass upon it, that the wisest thing was to have two men spend their time on it, Mr. Potter and Mr. Dixey, instead of twelve of us or fourteen of us spending our time on the same thing. Now, I have no power to insist on your agreeing. Of course I would be very glad to have you agree if you can. It is entirely a matter for you as to whether you will agree or not. I cannot hold, Brother Conrad, that the experts do agree when they are here and disagree.

Mr. Conrad: I agree entirely in that, but the accountant on behalf of West Virginia stated, as I understood him, in open Court not ten minutes ago that the differences between himself and Mr. Potter amounted to $42,000.

Mr. Conley: $49,000.

Mr. Conrad: Very well; $49,000, or $59,000, if you say so, in favor of the State of Virginia.

Mr. Dixey: May I modify that and say as shown by the schedule presented here to-day?

The Special Master: The amount is immaterial. 896

Mr. Conrad: And the attorney General has stated that and we accept his statement.

The Special Master: You mean that you accept their schedules?

Mr Conrad: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: In full?

Mr. Conrad: Oh, no, the difference. We waive the balance of $49,000, or whatever it is.

The Special Master: What do you say to this suggestion? I suppose the $49,000 may not be attributable to any one item, and of course this is purely a hypothesis on my part; they may contend that it is distributed over various items, and that they cannot make an admission covering it in that way. Is that it?

Mr. Dixey: Yes. There may be hundreds of thousands of dollars involved in it.

Mr. Conrad: We have had that voluntary statement from the accountant for West Virginia, that there may be hundreds of thousands of dollars. We have not heard of it before. We heard it only when the Attorney General of Virginia agreed that he would accept the balance as found by the accountant for West Virginia. Now, my object in rising to occupy your time is this: We have agreed to all these things, we have agreed to fix the time as 1823 instead of 1820 or 1821; we have agreed to the other items, in the interest of time only—not because we believed they were right and we were wrong. Now, it is proposed again, and I understood that it would be proposed, last night, that there shall be another adjournment of this case. If your Honor has any interest professionally or otherwise that requires your attention away from here, 897 we yield to that, of course; but if there is to be another adjournment, I want earnestly to suggest that that adjournment be to a time when the final argument and submission of this case to you be made. Let the time to which this adjournment is made be occupied, as much of it is necessary, in getting this record into condition; but let the remainder of that time be occupied in the final argument and submission of this case to you.

The Special Master: You mean let the time in the interim be so occupied?

Mr. Conrad: Yes, let the next meeting be the final meeting, wherever it is, New York or anywhere else. If there are any matters of reconciliation of discrepancies to be made there, let that be done before the argument is entered upon; but let it be done on that occasion in New York, or wherever you choose to meet, and when that is done, then let us enter upon the final argument in this case and put it in your hands, so that there may be no other adjournment for the purpose of perfecting this record. This in the interest of time. * * * * *

So that the only schedule that appears to involve the possibility of serious delay is Schedule D, relating to the ordinary expenses of the State Government. There is a difference between the two accountants in the totals, of $49,000, that being Virginia's excess over West Virginia's statement. Now, we say we will accept West Virginiaa's statement. 898 899

The Special Master: In toto.

Mr. Harrison: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: On that proposition?

Mr. Harrison: On that proposition. It has been suggested by Mr. Dixey, the accountant for West Virginia, that he is not prepared to say—

The Special Master: That presents a little different question. The impression I got was you were not willing to diminish your claim by $49,000, but the proposition now is that you will take the schedule presented by West Virginia as true.

Mr. Harrison: Not as to classification.

The Special Master: No, not as to classification.

Mr. Harrison: I think we agree, and probably in an hour we can determine among ourselves.

The Special Master: It does not involve classification. Will you take the schedule of West Virginia as submitted, as to the amount, without binding yourselves as to classification?

Mr. Harrison: We can answer that in a little while, after these accountants see if that is not the fact.

The Special Master: In the first place, I cannot require either of you to agree on either of these things. You are only doing it as a matter of courtesy and to get through with this work; but if West Virginia has submitted a schedule, and as to that Virginia agrees that the amount stated therein is accurat. I 900 will take those amounts as accurate, and as the agreement of both parties. As to the classification, I will hear you about that later. If you are willing to take the classification of West Virginia on those amounts as accurate in amounts, that eliminates that from controversy.

Mr. Harrison: I think that can be done.

Mr. Anderson: We will take West Virginia's account, as far as it goes.

Mr. Harrison: I was going to say as far as it goes.

Mr. Anderson: We have eighteen million dollars in addition.

The Special Master: Those are separate entirely. They include interest.

Mr. Anderson: Yes.

The Special Master: Of course that item we do not require them to agree to.

Mr. Harrison: They do agree on amounts.

The Special Master: Yes. Then it is for me to say, with the evidence in this case, whether that interest will be allowed or not. But you agree on the amounts. All you want to be heard on is the question as to whether it will be allowed.

Mr. Harrison: I was going to make this suggestion. West Virginia's schedule shows $17,582,585.25 of ordinary expenses of the State Government during the period covered by the contracting of this debt, down to 1861. Is not that correct?

Mr. Dixey: No, sir, it is not. We cannot even start out— 901 our schedule shows over $18,000,000 as it stands.

Mr. Anderson: Then you have changed it?

Mr. Dixey: No, sir. Mr. Potter has changed it. Mr. Potter has deducted two items from our schedule and put them in another schedule in another account. Those two items are agreed to, and added to that amount he has there, brings ours. But the whole principle is so different that agreeing to the $42,000 would not reconcile the difference between us; because Mr. Potter takes the original figures and deducts hundreds of thousands of dollars, and then takes our original figures and adds hundreds of thousands of dollars; and they say the difference is $42,000. It is true, but it does not mean anything.

The Special Master: But if they do this; if they take your schedule in toto, with the amount stated, as a true statement, the only thing left on the schedule is the question of proper classification. It is quite open to Virginia, if they want to do it; if you have submitted a schedule containing items, it is open to you to agree that those items are a truthful statement of those items, and reserve the right as to the question of whether they are properly classified. Now, if there are any details that can be submitted by the experts on either side that will illuminate the question as to whether or not they are properly classified, that is something you know more about than I do; but if there are any other things to be determined by Acts of the Legislature and not by experts, those are things that I will have to pass upon myself, probably. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir. 902

The Special Master: And if Virginia is willing to take that position under this paragraph, to agree that these amounts are accurately stated, I will enter it upon the record; and later I will hear you upon the proposition of classification. If you need any additional evidence to establish your contention, pro or con., that evidence I will hear now. It seems to me that simplifies the whole situation, if Virginia is willing to take that course.

Mr. Harrison: Do you deny that your statement of the ordinary expenses, after deducting school expenses, leaves $17,000,000?

Mr. Dixey: That was not your first statement. I do not deny that.

Mr. Harrison: Well, I say we accept that statement, so far as it goes, as being accurate; and that is what he shows. The difference, if your Honor pleases, includes items that they have excluded and we have included.

The Special Master: What are those items?

Mr. Harrison: As to those items, they are in agreement about, as I understand.

The Special Master: As to amounts?

Mr. Harrison: As to amount. It is purely a question of whether they shall or shall not be included. Let me go a little further.

The Special Master: Very well.

Mr. Harrison: We show our expenses, our share of the expenses of the State Government, for the period included was $37,875,000 and something.

The Special Master: Some $18,000,000 of which is interest? 903

Mr. Harrison: Some $18,000,000 of which they agree upon as the amount, and some million or more of several items are agreed upon as to the amount.

The Special Master: That eliminates that.

Mr. Harrison: It is merely a question of whether they shall be or shall not be included in a statement of ordinary expenses.

The Special Master: Upon the question of whether they ought to be or ought not to be included, is there any information that the experts have gathered that will illuminate that question?

Mr. Conrad: I think it is purely a question of law.

The Special Master: You understand the question. Of course, if there are any computations that have a legitimate bearing upon that proposition, one way or the other, we want them. If there are not, we will not spend any more time on those items. For instance, $18,000,000 interest. If they both agree that that is the sum to be charged, if any sum is charged, that ends that so far as any testimony in this case is concerned—unless you have something in the way of legislation or anything else, whatever it is, that tends to show that it ought not to be included, or the other side has anything tending to show that it ought to be included; if you are willing to agree to the schedules submitted by West Virginia, with the exception of a number of items, the amount of which you agree to, I do not see any difficulty in reaching an agreement on this proposi- 904 tion. Then we bring the controversy down to these items as to which you agree upon the amounts, but do not agree as to whether they shall be included.

Mr. Harrison: That is a matter of argument.

Mr. Conrad: That would be for the argument.

The Special Master: It is a matter of argument in the end, but, quo ad, is there any evidence on that that you desire to introduce?

Mr. McClintic: Before we go on, I have had no opportunity to look at that. I understand it was only given to Mr. Dixey yesterday.

The Special Master: Very well. Let me see if I understand it. You have presented a schedule here by Mr. Dixey, to which he has sworn, as being true, and I have no doubt he believes is true, and it states the facts from your point of view. They present a schedule on the same subject matter. In their schedule they include items which you do not include, and which you say ought not to be included; but as to these items Mr. Dixey agrees that they are properly stated.

Mr. Dixey: I do not know that I do. I have not had time to examine the schedule.

The Special Master: I perhaps was assuming too much. While it may be embarrassing, we have to take these things as we find them here. I cannot compel you people to agree. I can do this. West Virginia submits a schedule under this paragraph. If Virginia sees fit to agree to the accuracy of all the items in that schedule, I will enter upon the record that the parties agree as to those 905 items, in the amounts. Now, in addition to that West Virginia or Virginia does not agree to the classification contained in that schedule and wants to produce any evidence sustaining her contentions, and if she does want to produce such evidence I will hear it. If they do not agree and they think the evidence is already in, that settles that. If, on the other hand, the other side want to submit additional evidence to sustain their schedule, to sustain their contention that their schedule is correct, I will hear that. If they have not anything to submit as to the items in your schedule to which Virginia agrees, there is no necessity for any further controversy because there is no disagreement. Now, as to these items. Take, for instance, the interest and the half dozen other items that you say ought to be included and which they say ought not to be included. If you agree on that amount, I will enter that as an agreement. If you do not, I will give Mr. Dixcy time to verify and see if he does agree. Of course, in the absence of their agreeing, we would have to sit here and take the testimony, or I would have to appoint an expert to go over it. I do not suppose anybody expects me to perform the office of expert. Of course, if these experts do not agree, and you do not want to sit here and listen and examine, I would have to submit the matters to an expert who would go into the question and then report to me, and would be subject, of course, to cross examination. It seems to me that is the situation. If Virginia is merely to say that they agree to your schedule under this paragraph and the amounts stated therein, not binding 906 themselves as to classification, I do not see that there is any further controversy about the amounts.

Mr. Dixcy: There is no schedule in evidence which Virginia could agree to at the present moment. Our original schedule showed a total of over $20,000,000, from which Mr. McClintic withdrew some $2,000,000, leaving about $18,000,000, in addition to that there have been various items agreed upon that have altered some of the items as they appeared in the original schedules. The changes have not been material, but I believe the statement is about $351.00. There are twenty or thirty changes in the schedule as originally presented, I believe, and the new schedule has not been presented in evidence. It was our understanding that it would not be until Virginia and West Virginia agreed on it.

The Special Master: What is the reason the schedule you submitted at the last hearing is not in evidence?

Mr. Dixcy: It has been altered.

The Special Master: Well, I would like to know why the schedule you offered last time is not in evidence?

Mr. Dixcy: It is.

The Special Master: Well, if they see fit to agree to that, how am I going to help that and how are you going to help it?

Mr. Dixey: There was $2,000,000 withdrawn from that at the last hearing.

The Special Master: I don't care whether there was $10,- 907 000,000 withdrawn. Quo ad, suppose they withdrew all the others. I knew nothing about the details of this, but if with the exception of the $2,000,000 which they withdrew, they are willing to agree to that schedule, what harm is there in it?

Mr. Conrad: I should like to know on whose behalf and what interest is represented by the counsel accountant?

The Special Master: It seems to me this comes to a simple proposition—

Mr. Carlisle: I would say in behalf of Mr. Dixey that I do not understand that he is undertaking to act as counsel.

The Special Master: I do not understand that he is either, not at all. I don't think that Brother Conrad intended to intimate that Mr. Dixey was transgressing—

Mr. Carlisle: We cannot explain it as well as Mr. Dixey can, very often.

The Special Master: Perhaps they appreciate that Mr. Dixey was handling the matter with considerable intelligence.

Mr. Carlisle: I suppose it is understood that we meet to-morrow morning for the purpose of hearing these two witnesses, unless their depositions are agreed to.

The Special Master: No; I understood that was rather superseded by the agreement that they take those depositions anyway.

Mr. Carlisle: Then, perhaps my suggestion was not appropriate.

The Special Master: If have submitted a schedule here at the last session, which with the exception of an item of $2,000,000 the other side are now ready to agree to—it may be that I do not 908 quite comprehend the full situation, but for the life of me, I cannot see why there should be any further controversy about that.

[Vol. 7. July 1, 1909. Further Discussion of Differences in Schedules.]

The Special Master: I would like to make this inquiry. As 912 to Paragraph 4, which involves the schedule we have been talking about, where you eliminate the $2,000,000 item, are the counsel for Virginia prepared now to say that they will take the schedule submitted by West Virginia and agree to the accuracy of all the items stated therein?

Mr. Anderson: We agree to it as far as it goes. The errors in West Virginia's statements are errors of omission.

The Special Master: Will you note the question that I put. Will the counsel for Virginia enter now upon the record the statement that they agree to the accuracy of all the items submitted by the schedule for West Virginia under paragraph 4, the same paragraph as to which Virginia submitted its schedule, Plaintiff's Exhibit D-1? Do you agree to the accuracy of those items? If you do—

Mr. Anderson: We agree to those items as far as they go.

The Special Master: My question does not include any other items. I would like to know without qualification if there is any objection. The question is especially confined to the schedule. West Virginia submits a schedule. It has withdrawn an item of $2,000,000. With the exception of that item, West Virginia stands by the items therein stated as being accurate in amount. Does Virginia now agree to the accuracy of that schedule, in amount, so far as that schedule goes?

Mr. Anderson: So far as the amount goes.

The Special Master: That may be entered upon the record, that Virginia and West Virginia agree upon the schedule submitted by West Virginia, marked "Defendant's Schedule D-1," 913 that the amounts stated therein, in that schedule, are correctly stated; and the Master will report that the parties agree thereto. Now, that eliminates that schedule, so far as that goes.

Mr. Conley: But as modified at the time of its introduction.

The Special Master: Oh, certainly. It does not bind either party to the schedules, but it does eliminate every item in that schedule from now, except that $2,000,000 item. Now, there are items that Virginia claims ought to be included in that schedule. I will read them. Is this it (indicating)?

Mr. Harrison: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Now, what are the items that you claim, Brother Harrison, ought to go in here?

Mr. Harrison: I think it would be better to let Mr. Potter take the stand and explain this now.

The Special Master: Does page 2 include all the items that are not included in the schedule?

Mr. Harrison: Pages 3 and 2.

The Special Master: Just give me the items that you claim should go in, which they have not included. Tell me where they are. First, in the item of interest.

Mr. Harrison: No. Look at the top of page 2. We are taking up the items of page 2 and 3 that do not embrace the interest. That is on a different page, which we call your attention to presently.

The Special Master: Yes.

Mr. Harrison: Now, you will observe that the first item on page 2 of our schedule, substitute, is dependent on original totals, deducting school commissions. They have deducted from their ordinary expenses school commissions. 914

The Special Master: There is an item of $2,000,000—

Mr Carlisle: No, that is $860,000. That is part of that.

Mr. Harrison: They did deduct, in all, $2,000,000. I think I had better let Mr. Potter explain that.

The Special Master: All right.

Mr. Harrison: At all events the figures following there will show. That item, if your Honor please, is the ordinary expenses of the Government, total amount shown, according to defendant's exhibit, revised exhibit. Now, we say that is incorrect in so far as it does not include other items that ought to be included as ordinary expenses.

Mr. Carlisle: You have agreed to our items?

The Special Master: We have agreed to the items, yes. What I want to find out is the item he says should be included.

Mr. Harrison: The first is tobacco receipts deducted by the defendants from ordinary expenses, amounting to $353,123.96.

The Special Master: Please step around here, Mr. Dixcy.

Mr. Harrison: No, let Mr. Dixcy say whether that is not correct.

The Special Master: You have not included that. They think it ought to be included. 915

Mr. Harrison: You have taken credit for it where they ought not to have taken credit for it, and we are putting it back. You are trying to take credit for it.

Mr. McClintic: No, we are not taking credit for it.

Mr. Harrison: I ask Mr. McClintic if I am to understand him to say that that item was not taken account of by West Virginia at all.

Mr. McClintic: Let the expert testify.

Mr. Harrison: You are withdrawing your remark?

Mr. McClintic: No, I am not withdrawing anything: I simply don't want to get into a controversy.

The Special Master: Mr. Dixcy, please state whether or not the amount of $353,123.96, which appears in the plaintiff's substitute Exhibit D-1, is a correct statement of tobacco receipts during the period.

Mr. Dixcy: May I ask a question preliminary to answering that? The original figures in this schedule have been restored.

The Special Master: That does not quite answer the question.

Mr. Dixcy: If it does, yes; if not, no.

The Special Master: Here is a question—and if I do not make it plain, say so. I will try to make it plain. The question is whether the item of tobacco receipts, $353,123.96, which 916 appears on page 2 of Plaintiff's Substitute Exhibit D-1, is accurately stated in amount.

Mr. Dixey: It agrees with the amount in Defendant's Exhibit D-1 as originally introduced.

The Special Master: You may eliminate that suggestion and answer the question just as I asked it. I do not want it confused that way. Is the amount of $353,123.96 the correct aggregate?

Mr. Dixey: I don't know, Mr. Littlefield.

The Special Master: Have you not got it in one of your schedules?

Mr. Dixey: There are two figures here, one the original figure and one the adjusted figure.

The Special Master: What is your original figure?

Mr. Dixey: The original figure was that amount.

The Special Master: The original figure made by you?

Mr. Dixey: Yes.

The Special Master: Intended to be true?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Was it true?

Mr. Dixey: We believed it to be so.

The Special Master: Do you believe it to be true now?

Mr. Dixey: There have been adjustments made—

The Special Master: Do you believe it to be true now? You said it was true; do you believe it to be true now? If you do, that settles that. If you do not, please say so.

Mr Dixey: I do not think that is the correct figure now.

The Special Master: You do not think it is? 917

Mr. Dixey: No, sir.

The Special Master: On revising your notes and figures, you have discovered an error?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: What is the amount of the error?

Mr. Dixey: The revised figures are $346,560.65.

The Special Master: Then, as to that item, you do not agree, and you want to change your original testimony, do you not? You first testified that that item was correct, that the figures $353,123.96 was correct. Did you or did you not?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir; that was the original testimony.

The Special Master: Now, then, since then you have discovered that you made a mistake. Is that right?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Very well. We will leave that out. Now, what is the error?

Mr. Dixey: $346,560.65, as I have it.

The Special Master: Are you satisfied that that amount is correct?

Mr. Dixey: No, sir; I am not. That was to be compared with Mr. Potter, and I am not entirely sure that it has been so compared.

The Special Master: Well, I will ask Virginia if Virginia is willing to agree that $346,560.65, now changed by Mr. Dixey, is the accurate statement of the amount. Are you willing to agree to that?

Mr. Harrison: No, sir; we do not agree to that because we have already compared it with his chief of staff and 918 have ascertained that the $353,000—

The Special Master: We cannot discuss that, then. I cannot compel you to agree. It is open to you on cross examination to ascertain why the change was made. Take the next item, "Constitutional Convention."

Mr. Harrison: Before that, I would like to ask Mr. Dixey what he did with that in his account.

Mr. Dixey: I understood that there was a tobacco warehouse included originally, about $4,000, which was deducted, and I think that that was agreed upon between Mr. Potter and Mr. Scoville.

Mr. Harrison: But that does not answer the question. Do you not take credit for $353,123.96 in your account by deducting those tobacco receipts that go to ordinary expenses?

Mr. Dixey: On the original schedule, yes, sir.

The Special Master: That will show.

Mr. Harrison: You do do that?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir.

Mr. Harrison: Where did the receipts come from; where were they derived?

Mr. Dixey: From the inspectors of tobacco, received from the inspectors of tobacco, less certain amounts that were paid out and expenses of the Commissioners, refunds, and amounts paid for burnt tobacco; and the balance was that amount.

Mr. Harrison: Where were those warehouses located?

Mr. Dixey: They were located all over the State.

Mr. Harrison: Were any of them located in the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia?

Mr. Dixey: Not that I recall, no, sir.

Mr. Harrison: Why, then, do you deduct receipts of to- 919 bacco as a proper credit on the total of ordinary expenses of the State government?

Mr. Dixey: These items were all gone over in conference with counsel and that was by instruction of counsel.

Mr. Harrison: What have the receipts that the State may have derived from her connection with the tobacco warehouses located in the present State of Virginia got to do with West Virginia's fair proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government?

Mr. Dixey: Well, they were the general receipts that seemed to belong to the State as a whole, and we thought it was the best way to apportion them—simply to deduct them from the ordinary expenses.

Mr. Harrison: West Virginia takes credit for something that Virginia received into her treasury—

Mr. Dixey: This is not a credit to West Virginia.

Mr. Harrison: Does not West Virginia take credit for it?

Mr. Dixey: Not for that.

Mr. Harrison: Have you not deducted that from your total ordinary expenses?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir.

Mr. Harrison: Is not that taking credit for it?

Mr. Dixey: No. sir; certainly not. West Virginia gets credit for only her proportion of it, that comes from the total of all the ordinary expenses.

Mr. Harrison: I understand. I say that diminishes the total of the ordinary expenses, does it not?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir; but West Virginia did not get credit 920 for it, but only a part of it.

The Special Master: Except her pro-rata share, and your theory is that that should be deducted in order to get the net?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir.

Mr. Harrison: And you say you got that from conference with counsel?

Mr. Dixey: From a conference with counsel, yes, sir.

Mr. Harrison: I want to remind you of the statement that Mr. McClintic made at the bar a few moments ago, that there were no warehouses located in West Virginia and of course West Virginia had nothing to do with receipts from tobacco warehouses.

Mr. McClintic: I am not testifying.

The Special Master: I do not understand that Mr. Harrison claims that this was chargeable to West Virginia per se, but in getting at his total of ordinary expenses covered over the whole State, that it is proper to deduct this. That is his theory. He deducts this to get his net expenditures. Whether there is legal foundation for it, of course is another proposition.

Mr. Harrison: As to that, Virginia takes no account of that as having any proper place in the statement of the ordinary expenses, and in order to restore the status of the ordinary expenses to the figures that she thinks are correct, she puts that item back. West Virginia having taken it off she puts it back in that 921 column.

The Special Master: That is, West Virginia practically undertakes to make a wash entry of it. that is, if she is allowed the credit you want to make the charge, one counterbalancing the other?

Mr. Harrison: Yes.

The Special Master: I understand that; but the thing we are interested in particularly now is the amount. Of course, Mr. Dixey has changed the amount to $346,000. Now, what I would like to know is whether Virginia agrees to that.

Mr. Anderson: No, because the other amount has been deducted by West Virginia. We do not, for that simple reason.

The Special Master: I understand, but that amount of $353,123.96 would go out altogether, and in its place would be the $346,560.65.

Mr. Anderson: That would require a re-statement of their whole account, because they have deducted it.

The Special Master: But that could be arranged without any trouble.

Mr. Anderson: Of course; but the way to correct that is to charge back the same amount.

The Special Master: That is true. I understand Mr. Dixey to now say that instead of the item being $353,000 it should be $346,000, and he wants to credit the general sum of ordinary expenses with that and reduce it and make it net. Now, are you willing to agree that $346,560.65 is the amount of the tobacco receipts, either to be credited or charged, as the case may be. If they credit it, you say they ought to charge it, so as to offset it. 922
Are you willing to agree that the amount shall be $346,560.65?

Mr. Harrison: It involves this. There would be a difference of some $6,000 or $8,000, and that $6,000 or $8,000 consists of items that they have located elsewhere, and have taken credit for elsewhere. It is the sale of a warehouse in Virginia—

The Special Master: How much did you receive for it?

Mr. Potter: $5,880.81.

The Special Master: Are you able to state whether that $5,880.81 is correct, the sum allowed on account of the sale of the warehouse?

Mr. Dixey: I have not the figures here.

The Special Master: Where are your working papers?

Mr. Dixey: Downstairs.

The Special Master: Bring them up, please.

Mr. Carlisle: I may be mistaken, but I have understood that the figures in the original account presented by Mr. Dixey, with the exception of about $2,000,000, have been agreed to. Now, I understand this examination to show that they are not correct.

The Special Master: No; what we are doing now, if I understand it, is this. Virginia claims that there should be other items allowed for which they are entitled to charge under so-called ordinary expenses.

Mr. Carlisle: They want an additional item put in. Now they have agreed that the items are correct.

The Special Master: Is it your point that that $353,123.96 923 was included in that schedule as a credit?

Mr. Carlisle: I don't know.

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: And therefore that they agree to it?

Mr. Carlisle: It is credited there.

The Special Master: And having been credited there, you say it ought to be settled?

Mr. Carlisle: They having agreed to it.

The Special Master: Very well. Let me call your attention to the fact that your expert is the man who now disagrees to it.

Mr. Carlisle: He cannot disagree to it.

The Special Master: Very well, then. Mr. Dixey declines to say he would agree to it. He said he testified the other day and wanted to change it. It stood as $353,123.96 and it was your expert that undertook to change it to $346,560.65. Of course if you want to ride over your expert, you have a right to do so.

Mr. Carlisle. Mr. Dixey made his answer in response to a question put by the other side.

The Special Master: No, it was in response to a question by me.

Mr. Carlisle: By somebody.

The Special Master: If you say, Brother Carlisle, that counsel for West Virginia thinks that the item of $353,123.96 is correct and should go into the accounts, that settles it.

Mr. Carlisle: I have not said it was correct, for I don't 924 know anything about it. I have simply said that the parties on the other side agreed it was correct, and I thought the record showed that the amounts and the items were correct.

The Special Master: It did show it until your own expert declined to accede to it.

Mr. McClintic: It is incorrect, because they have deducted a building and certain accounts—

The Special Master: We will get there in a moment. Send down for your notes, Mr. Dixey, please. Of course, if the point is made that that is included as a credit and that is binding on the parties, of course that eliminates it.

Mr. Carlisle: Suppose we want to prove something different from that account; would you be willing to do that—

The Special Master: No sir.

Mr. Carlisle: That is what they are trying to do.

The Special Master: Then that settles that, and we will not discuss it any longer. The fact about it is, as it stands now, the objection to the accuracy of this item comes from Mr. Dixey and nobody else.

Mr. Carlisle: In response to a question.

The Special Master: Certainly, in response to a question.

Mr. Carlisle: I thought when Mr. Harrison began the examination and when your Honor put that question to Mr. Dixey that he was trying to show that some item had been omitted.

The Special Master: I thought so too.

Mr. Carlisle: And I understand the agreement to be that the items there are correct items and that the amounts are correct, but if there are any items that ought to be put in—

The Special Master: I understood it that way, but it turns 925 out we were in error and this item appeared in the schedule prepared by your accountant as a credit. I have misunderstood that just as you did. If you take the point that having appeared in that schedule as a credit, $353,000, that that is an agreement on that item, I suppose that is agreeable to the other side.

Mr. Carlisle: Yes; but I would have objected immediately if I had not understood he was trying to introduce some new item.

Mr. Anderson: We agree as to the amount, but not as to the application.

The Special Master: We can settle that now. Mr. Carlisle makes the point that this schedule to which you agreed contains this item of $353,000. Do you object to that?

Mr. Harrison: We do not agree that it is a proper item of credit.

The Special Master: That is not the question. The question is as to the amount.

Mr. Harrison: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Very well. There is no more controversy about the $353,000. You may record the amount as agreed to by both parties and was included in the previous schedule in accordance with the suggestion of Mr. Carlisle.

Mr. Anderson: We never agreed it was a proper credit.

Mr. Carlisle: Whether proper or improper, you have agreed to it.

Mr. Harrison: Oh, no.

Mr Anderson: I cannot allow the remark made by Mr. 926
Carlisle to go unchallenged. We did not suppose we were to be led into a trap. We agreed as to the amount and did not agree that there were not any set-offs against it, and errors in the method by which that result was reached—

Mr. Carlisle: If there was error in the account, then they were not correct and your agreement was wrong. You said they were correct.

The Special Master: The agreement went so far as to agree to the accuracy of the items and the amount stated therein, and it did not go so far as to bind either party on the question of classification.

Mr. Carlisle: No, sir; not at all.

The Special Master: And as to whether the items were or were not properly charged, I think I have stated that as much as fifteen times, and so many times I can re-state it as often as may be necessary for my own illumination, I do not intimate that anybody else needs to be illuminated about it.

Coming to the next item, Constitutional Convention, $258,906.28. I would like to ask Mr. Dixey if that is correct.

Mr. Dixey: $258,000, yes, sir.

The Special Master: That is agreed to by both parties as correct in amount. Do you have any objection to that?

Mr. Anderson: No, sir.

Mr. McClintic: No sir. 927

The Special Master: The next item is, "Slaves. Cost of Slaves transported and executed, $311,168.35." Is that item correctly stated in amount?

Mr. Dixey: (After referring to memorandum) $311,168.35.

The Special Master: That item is also agreed to in amount?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: The next is "Boundary Line, $16,704.78." Is that agreed to in amount?

Mr. Harrison: That is the aggregate of several boundary lines.

Mr. Dixey: No; it is given in one here, $16,704.78.

The Special Master: Is that agreed to?

Mr. Dixey: That is correct.

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: That item, then, is agreed to by both parties?

The next item is "Maps, Commonwealth and Board of Public Works, $16,628.04 and $11,446.48;" making a total of $28,074.52.

Mr. Dixey: That is correct.

The Special Master: Is the amount of that item agreed to by both parties?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: The next is "Deaf, Dumb and Blind Institution, 1845 to 1860."

Mr. Dixey: I will have to ask you to wait a moment. (Continuing after referring to memorandum.) We do not agree on that.

The Special Master: What is the difference, please?

Mr. Dixey: Well, they have got a total of $80,661.94. There is a difference of $20,000.

Mr. Potter: That is through the Literary Fund. 928

Mr. Dixey: I did not recognize it immediately. It can be reconciled, but we do not agree.

The Special Master: How about that? Is West Virginia willing to agree to—what is the sum that you make it?

Mr. Dixey: What became of that other $20,000?

The Special Master: No matter about that. What do you say you are willing to agree to?

Mr. Dixey: We have $100,661.94.

The Special Master: You have $100,000 and they have $80,000?

Mr. Dixey: I say we have it. It is merely a memorandum on our part. It has never been introduced in evidence as part of the account.

The Special Master: What objection, then, is there to agreeing that the amount of $80,000 is the correct amount of the item? You make it more; they simply claim that. If they are willing to agree to your item of $80,000, that ought to settle that.

Mr. McClintic: We will agree to that being the amount.

Mr. Anderson: The other $20,000 we thought ought to be struck out.

The Special Master: Then the amount of $80,661.94 is agreed to?

Mr. Anderson: Yes.

The Special Master: The next item is "International Ex- 929 changes, $2,836.19." Is that agreed to as to amount?

Mr. Dixey: That is right.

The Special Master: That item is agreed to as to amount. The next item is, "Over-payment of Treasury Note, $50." I suppose that item is agreed to in amount?

Mr. Dixey: $50 is right.

The Special Master: Let it be recorded that that is agreed to.

The next item is "Printing Treasury Notes, $375.74." Is that agreed to as to amount?

Mr. Anderson: Yes.

Mr. McClintic: Yes.

The Special Master: That is agreed to.

The next item is "Loss account of Counterfeit Money $190." Is that agreed to as to amount?

Mr. Dixey: Yes.

Mr. Anderson: Yes.

The Special Master: That is agreed to.

The next is "Virginia Military Institute, Additions and Improvements to Buildings, etc., $151,000." Is that amount right?

Mr. Dixey: $151,000 even is right.

The Special Master: That amount is agreed to by both sides, as to the amount?

Mr. Anderson: Yes.

Mr. Dixey: Yes.

The Special Master: "University of Virginia, Water Supply, $25,000." Is that amount agreed to? 930

Mr. Dixey: $25,000.

The Special Master: Let the record show that that amount is agreed to.

The next item is "Improvements, Public Square, and Improvements, Capitol Square, $1,456.91 and $12,278.47." Is that agreed to as to amount?

Mr Dixey: That is right.

Mr. Anderson: Yes.

The Special Master: The next item is "Fugitive Slave Expenses, $701." Is that amount agreed to?

Mr. Dixey: Take those items, that $701 and that $1,500; I have it in one.

The Special Master: You have $2,201?

Mr. Dixey: Yes.

The Special Master: Is that agreed to as to amounts?

Mr. Dixey: Yes; that is right.

The Special Master: The next is "Penitentiary Lot and New Hospital Building, $17,947.48." Is that agreed to as to amount?

Mr. Dixey: Yes.

Mr. Anderson: Yes .

The Special Master: The next item is "items of Indian defense in 1834, 1835, $754." And the next item is calling out the militia at Wheeling in 1838, $1,099. Those two items together make $1,853. Is that agreed to as to amount?

Mr. Dixey: We have not got that, $1,853.00; we will have to make further investigation.

The Special Master: How near to it have you got it?

Mr. Dixey: Total $1,099. 931

The Special Master: You have not got the $754?

Mr. Dixey: We do not locate it.

The Special Master: Well, the amount of the item $1,099, for calling out the militia at Wheeling in 1838 is agreed to?

Mr. Dixey: Yes.

The Special Master: That leaves $754?

Mr. Harrison: You have not that item at all?

Mr. Dixey: We do not locate it.

The Special Master: We will not wait for that.

Mr. Potter: It is probably included in the expenses of old wars.

Mr. Dixey: We can probably locate it.

The Special Master: The next is "Medical College of Virginia, Additions and Improvements to Buildings, etc., $25,000." Is that agreed to in amount?

Mr. Dixey: That is right.

The Special Master: That is agreed to.

The next is "Attorney General's Fees for prosecuting Selden Withers & Co., $500."

Mr. Dixey: Yes; $500.

The Special Master: That is agreed to as to amount?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, that is correct.

The Special Master: The next is "Eastern and Western Asylums: Additions and Improvements to Buildings, $363,845.56; and Support, $7,450.01; making a total of $371,295.57. Less buildings, original, $27,000, leaving $344,295.57." The first item is additions and improvements, $363,000. You have it right there, have you not?

Mr. Dixey: Yes. I have got to locate it. I have it, $371,295.57. They deduct buildings, $27,000, which I do not 932 locate immediately in my figures here.

Mr. Potter: That is included in the $371,000 but has been deducted.

The Special Master: Then, is it proper to say that the item of $344,000 is agreed to as to amount, after making a deduction of $27,000?

Mr. Dixey: Without knowing that there are not more buildings in there, I could not say.

Mr. Anderson: That is the original asylum.

The Special Master: Shall we mark that item as agreed to in amount?

Mr. Anderson: You can mark the $371,000 agreed to, if you want to. Mr. Scoville knew about that.

Mr. McClintic: Mr. Scoville became ill and had to leave.

The Special Master: Of course we are very sorry, but we cannot help that. Do you feel authorized to say that $344,000 is correct?

Mr. McClintic: I could not say.

The Special Master: Mr. Dixey agrees to the $371,000, and there is deducted $27,000 for the original buildings—

Mr. McClintic: I presume that is correct. Mr. Dixey thinks that possibly there are some more buildings—

The Special Master: Suppose we have this entry made as to that. That item is agreed to subject to the right of West Virginia to show that there are additional credits that should be deducted from the item. Is that agreeable? 933

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: The next item, "Gun House at Alexandria, $900." Is that agreed to as to amount?

Mr. Dixey: $900 is correct.

Mr. Anderson: Yes.

The Special Master: The amount of $900 is agreed to.

The next item is "Cannon House, Surry County, $110." Is that agreed to as to amount?

Mr. Dixey: That is correct as to amount.

The Special Master: The next is "Gun House for Richmond Artillery, Act of March 11, 1835, $1,079.09." Is that correct as to amount, and is it agreed to as to amount?

Mr. Dixey: That is correct as to amount.

The Special Master: The next item is "Sundries, B. P. W. Expenses, as follows: Legal expenses, $2,024.97."

Mr. Dixey: We do not agree as to that, by a small amount.

The Special Master: How much—less than $2,000?

Mr. Harrison: Why don't you agree?

Mr. Dixey: I cannot say immediately. We have $38,461.62.

The Special Master: You mean as the aggregate of those various items?

Mr. Dixey: I can explain—

Mr. Potter: $1,668.12 for the expenses of the agent to London. (Mr. Potter read some other figures from a memorandum.)

The Special Master: Then that leaves that amount?

Mr. Potter: Yes.

The Special Master: Then that is agreed to as to amount? 934 How about this interest on the public debt, amounting to $18,574,747.84. Is that agreed to as to amount?

Mr. Dixey: That is correct.

The Special Master: Now, are there any other items which Virginia claims which are not included in the schedule?

Mr. Anderson: No.

The Special Master: Are there any items which West Virginia claims which are not included in the schedule submitted at the previous hearing, that should be added to the schedule?

The question was, Brother Carlisle and Mr. Attorney General, whether under this paragraph there were any items that West Virginia claims should be taken into account in addition to those that they have in their schedules that we have just been over, items that Virginia claims should go in, and Mr. Dixey is inquiring—

Mr. Anderson: There are none to be included, none others to be included.

The Special Master: Then, so far as accounts are concerned, and items on those accounts and their amounts, the case is closed under Paragraph 4, and I am now ready to hear anything that may be offered by either party for the purpose of establishing their contention that these items should be included or should not be included, and Virginia may proceed.

[Vol. 7. July 2, 1909. Relating to Trans-Alleghany Lunatic Asylum.]

Mr. Anderson: The accountants have reconciled several of these items.

(At this point the witness, Judge McWhorter, was excused.)

The Special Master: Do you recollect the paragraph under which there were two items? 965

Mr. Dixey: I think one was $27,000.

The Special Master: And the other was $700—

Mr. Dixey: The $27,000 is correct, so far as it goes, but there were other buildings in there.

Mr. Harrison: This is schedule four, ordinary expenses.

Mr. Dixey: But it does not include all the buildings.

The Special Master: Now, as to that item, what is the reason—what schedule is that?

Mr. Harrison: That is schedule D-1.

[Vol. 7. July 2, 1909. General discussion. Direct Examination of A. G. Potter.]

The Special Master: The next paragraph, Schedule D, relates to the ordinary expenses. That was the paragraph as to which there were two items. Let me have that schedule. 978

(After examination of schedule). How about D now, Plaintiff's Substitute Exhibit D? Are you agreed on that, Mr. Dixey?

Mr. Dixey: Not including that item of the Eastern and Western Asylums, including that credit of $27,000. The credit is right, so far as it goes.

The Special Master: Just say that on Plaintiff's Substitute Exhibit D-1 the item of Indian defense in 1834, 1835, $754, is agreed to. Also let the record show that West Virginia contends that in the items relating to the Eastern and Western Asylums the total of $371,295.57 should be diminished by more than $27,000, because they contend that there was more than that expended in the construction of the original buildings that went into the first total.

Now, you have not been able, Mr. Dixey, to get your details, to state how much that would be?

Mr. Dixey: No, sir.

The Special Master: What do you say about there being additional buildings, Mr. Potter; have you investigated that?

Mr. Potter: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Were you able to find anything additional in the line of original construction?

Mr. Potter: Not in the line of original construction, but 979 there were buildings added from time to time.

The Special Master: I suppose Mr. Dixey would contend that if they added a wing that would be in the nature of original construction?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Now, take the $27,000, Mr. Dixey, that from time to time additions were made, which should be considered as the original construction. You say there were—

Mr. Potter: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: How much do you think they aggregate?

Mr. Potter: I cannot tell.

The Special Master: How much do you think, Mr. Dixey?

Mr. Dixey: A large sum; I could not say how much.

The Special Master: Well, what do you mean by a large sum?

Mr. Dixey: I could not tell you. We did not go into that.

The Special Master: We will not take time this morning to go over that.

Mr. Dixey: We can reconcile those later, Mr. Potter, and I can reconcile that.

The Special Master: That item is left with the understanding that Mr. Potter and Mr. Dixey report to the Master just exactly what those additional expenditures were, and the circumstances under which they were made, and that the Master will take the report made by them as to that item as the agreement of the parties, he to determine whether they are in the nature of an original expenditure and to be deducted. Of course you are to be heard 980 on that proposition. There is no sense in spending time discussing that. That is simply a question of judgment as to whether it is or is not. That is entirely for me to say, when we get to it. That takes care of that item.

The parties are bound by what these experts report to me, and I say whether the $27,000 shall be increased or not. That is just exactly as if we spent a week here talking about it, and just as good as to spend more time about it.

Now, then, take the next schedule.

Mr. Anderson: No; there is a very important matter there, the apportionment of the ordinary expenses of the government.

The Special Master: That is in the revised—

Mr. Anderson: No, sir—

The Special Master: Are these the results of the revised computation predicated upon the agreement entered into yesterday?

Mr. Anderson: No, a more important matter is this—

The Special Master: What is it?

Mr. Anderson: There was a misapprehension on the part of the accountants as to the principle upon which the apportionment shall be made, and the decree directs the apportionment to be made as to aggregate population and as to with and without slaves. 981

The Special Master: I do not make any apportionment; I simply report facts.

Mr. Anderson: The decree directs that apportionment be made as to population.

The Special Master: No, sir; I simply report the facts and what the decree does later on, none of us knows.

Mr. Anderson: I do not mean the court decided it.

Mr. Carlisle: You said they directed it to be done.

The Special Master: I report the amount of the ordinary expenses on the basis of the Virginia population with and without slaves. That is a matter of computation, as shown by the census.

Mr. Anderson: You have to make that?

The Special Master: Yes.

Mr. Anderson: The decree says it shall be done on the basis of the average total population of Virginia, with or without slaves.

Mr. Carlisle: Where?

Mr. Anderson: In the 4th Section.

Mr. Carlisle: It does not. We do not say on what basis it shall be made. The court may hereafter determine that.

Mr. Anderson: I do not say the court has decided which shall be done.

Mr. Carlisle: You did say that.

Mr. Anderson: I beg your pardon. The court has not decided anything upon that.

The Special Master: Please bring my attention to specific items.

Mr Anderson. The decree directs this apportionment to be made on the basis of average total population with and without slaves. Now, in making the computation and apportionment, 982 the accountant made the mistake of taking the census at the end of each decade; that is, for the years 1823 to 1830 he took the census for 1830; from 1830 to 1850 he took the census for 1840. The purpose of the court evidently was to come as nearly as possible to the actual population for each year for which these expenditures were made. Now, what the accountant has done, you will observe, is to ascertain the average population for each decade.

The Special Master: Here is a sheet of paper that you gave me, marked "Ordinary Expenses, March 23 to December 31, 1860," which is the schedule you are now discussing?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Has this been submitted to the other side?

Mr. Anderson: No, sir. This was made up only last night.

The Special Master: So it has not been submitted long enough for them to tell whether it is correct or not. We do not have to discuss that, because the whole thing is a matter of computation and incompetent. What I have to say is that if Mr. Dixey can take that and make his computation and report to me whether he agrees—

Mr. McClintic: When he has time to go over it.

The Special Master: Surely. If he does not agree with Mr. Potter, I will get an expert and have him make a computation.

Now, is there anything else? I will ask the stenographer 983 to mark this paper.

(Papers handed to the stenographer were filed with the case and marked "West Virginia 1, West Virginia 2 and West Virginia 3.")

Mr. Harrison: We want Mr. Potter to take the stand to explain some of these things.

Whereupon:

ARTHUR G. POTTER,

a witness heretofore sworn in behalf of the plaintiff, was recalled for further examination:

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. You will observe that the Virginia schedule D-1 includes a number of items of expenditures in the State of West Virginia, which according—

Mr. Anderson: Do you mean ordinary expenses?

Q. (Continuing) I mean to say ordinary expenses of Government, which according to our view should be included.

The Special Master: I understand that was suspended yesterday so as to give you a chance.

Mr. Harrison: I would like Mr. Potter to explain the character and circumstances—

The Special Master: Sure. You may now state the reason why you include those items as a proper subject of charge under this, as a part of ordinary expenses of government. You can begin with the first item and go down through, or make a statement covering them all, if you can. Put it in your own way and give all the detail you think necessary, in order that I may have the information necessary to pass upon that question. Begin with 984 $353,123.96, tobacco receipts.

A. We ascertained that the tobacco warehouses controlled by the State were in the following places: Richmond and Petersburg:

Dinwiddie, Campbell, Prince Edward, Mecklenburg, Buckingham, Cumberland, Albemarle, Nelson and Pittsylvania counties, all counties within the present State of Virginia; and that the business being done in Virginia was a proper receipt for the State of Virginia and was not a credit to the ordinary expenses of government. West Virginia took credit for that by deducting from the ordinary expenses.

By the Special Master:

Q. Your contention is that ought not to appear on either side?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that all that is to be said about that?

A. We have agreed as to the total—

Q. I understand that, but is that all that needs to be said in order to show what the record is?

Mr. Harrison: You may state briefly how those receipts are derived. No matter about that; you may cross that question out.

Mr. Carlisle: I would like to have that, then. We would like to know about that.

The Witness: They were receipts for inspection and storage of unmanufactured crop tobacco, whether stemmed or unstemmed; also for the sale of waste and sample tobacco or the tobacco remaining in the warehouse three years. 985

Mr. Carlisle: That is all on that.

The Special Master: They were paid out and afterwards reimbursed by the industry.

The Witness: There were no payments by the State except for the salaries of the inspectors.

Mr. McClintic: Were not the salaries of these inspectors paid and charged in the ordinary expenses?

A. I cannot say that. They were paid by the expenses. They were deducted from the figure that produces this net figure that you have deducted from your ordinary expenses.

By the Special Master:

Q. As I understand it, Virginia contends that this item of tobacco receipts, either disbursements or receipts, does not appear on either side of the account as you have stated it; you have elimimated it altogether?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And therefore you think West Virginia ought not to be entitled to the credit?

A. Yes, sir.

The Special Master: On that item, have you any further cross examination, Mr. McClintic?

Mr. McClintic: The inspectors were paid by the State, were they not, and paid out of the salary fund?

The Witness: They were paid by any money that happened to be in the treasury. There was no salary fund, as I understand it.

Mr. McClintic: And that money that was paid to them is charged up in the ordinary expenses, is it not?

The Witness: Charged up in the salary account. 986

The Special Master: Although it may be that the State paid the salary of the inspectors of tobacco, and that was included in the first instance in the salary fund, in making that statement you have deducted from the salary fund as a charge the amounts thus paid to the inspectors of tobacco; is that right?

The Witness: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: So it does not appear in their account at all. What about the next item? Please take those items, Mr. Potter, and go through them.

The Witness: Expenses of Constitutional Convention.

The Special Master: Is there anything that needs to be said about that except that it was a constitutional convention to revise the constitution of the State? I suppose I may take judicial notice of that fact?

Mr. Harrison: Two conventions; one of 39-40 and one of 49-50.

The Special Master: Is there anything to say about that, except that there were two conventions?

Mr. Harrison: No.

The Special Master The next item is "Cost of Slaves Transported and Executed." Does not that item speak for itself and show what it was for?

The Witness: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Of course I will assume that the State was transporting and attending to these slaves. 987

Mr. Carlisle: And the question is whether it was on ordinary expense.

The Special Master: Yes. Unless there is some special fact that should be in the record, we will not have to spend any time on that.

Mr. Anderson: There is nothing except what appears in the Statutes.

The Special Master: Very well.

The next is "Boundary Line." I suppose that was money expended for the boundary line?

The Witness: Several boundary line disputes.

The Special Master: It does not make any difference how many there were; I suppose that speaks for itself. That is all there is of that. I do not think there is anything to be added to that.

The next is "Maps." Commonwealth and Board of Public Works.

I suppose they used a lot of maps and the State paid for them. Is there anything more than that to be said about that?

The Witness: Those were maps—

Mr. McClintic: Big State maps, were they not?

The Witness: Yes, sir.

Mr. Carlisle: They were maps made in connection with the development of the State.

The Special Master: Maps that were thought to be necessary to properly develop the work under the control of the Board of Public Works.

Mr. McClintic: What I wanted to add was that these were State maps, maps of the whole State.

Mr. Harrison: Yes. 988

The Special Master: Well, the maps were State wide and covered the whole State.

The Witness: I don't know that I can state that positively. There may have been some county maps.

The Special Master: Well, it is more to your interest that they cover the whole State. The next item is "Deaf, Dumb and Blind Institution, 1845 to 1860." What is there to say about that?

Mr. Harrison: That has nothing to do with the original cost.

The Special Master: I understand this is a matter of improvements and additions to buildings?

Mr. Anderson: And enlargements.

The Special Master: Of course, that will raise the question as to whether it is an investment in the plant or a matter to be taken into account in the maintenance of the plant. The next is "International Exchanges."

The Witness: That was an amount appropriated for expenses in connection with the exchange of books, works of art, and agricultural implements with foreign governments, 1849 to 1860.

The Special Master: That is justified, I suppose, by the accumulation of public intelligence, which Virginia received as a matter of courtesy from these countries. Can you add anything to that?

Mr. Carlisle: I suppose not.

The Special Master: Does that state the facts?

Mr. Carlisle: So far as we know.

The Special Master: That cleans that up. The next is "Over- 989 payment of Treasury Note, $50." What is that; did they pay a note twice?

Mr. Potter: I don't know that it was one note, but there was a difference of $50 after all the notes had been paid.

The Special Master: They paid it and did not recover it back; is that it?

Mr. Potter: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Printing treasury notes. Does not that explain itself?

Mr. Potter: That is the cost of printing the treasury notes, yes.

The Special Master: Loss on account of counterfeit money. Can anything be added to that; does that not explain itself?

Mr. Potter: Except the money was received from the Northwestern and Merchants and Mechanics Banks at Wheeling, being moneys received by the treasurer.

The Special Master: When?

Mr. Potter: 1859.

The Special Master: And it turned out that that was counterfeit?

Mr. Potter: And has been charged as a loss in the ordinary expenses.

The Special Master: The State did not collect it. Of course that left the bank liable for it. As a matter of fact, the State lost it and did not collect it. Is that all of that?

Mr. Potter: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Virginia Military Institute, Additions and Improvements to Buildings, $151,000. Is that criticised because the aggregate, $151,000, may include what would be additions as well as improvements; or is that sufficiently intelligible? 990

Mr. McClintic: It is all buildings, is it not, Mr. Potter?

Mr. Potter: It is buildings, yes. They were all additional buildings.

The Special Master: Then when you say improvements there, all you mean to say is that the addition thus made was an improvement on the original plant?

Mr. Potter: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: It is admitted it was an addition to the buildings?

Mr. Potter: Some of them were very small.

The Special Master: It is a matter of no consequence about their size—

Mr. Conrad: This was a mess hall added to the Institute.

The Special Master: It is quite immaterial what it was.

Mr. Anderson: That was only part of it.

The Special Master: A designation adds nothing to it. Your contention is it ought not to be allowed, and their contention is it should be allowed. Your proposition, Brother Carlisle, is that it was an addition to property which was an investment. I suppose that is your contention. That takes care of that item. The next is University of Virginia: Water Supply. 991

Mr. Potter: An appropriation for the University of $25,000 for the purpose of repairing and improving the buildings thereof and for furnishing a supply of water.

The Special Master: Was there a system of water works constructed for the use of the University of Virginia?

Mr. Potter: Yes.

The Special Master: That covers that, then. The only question is whether that is a maintenance charge or an additional charge. Have you any suggestions to make, Brother McClintic?

Mr. McClintic: No, sir.

The Special Master: Brother Anderson?

Mr. Anderson: No, sir.

The Special Master: Improvements Public Square and Improvements Capitol Square. I suppose that is just what the heading shows?

Mr. Potter: Yes. That should read Capitol Square, Governor's Mansion, and so forth.

The Special Master: When you say improvements in Public Square and improvements in Capitol Square, do you mean to say that is simply a question of repairing, keeping in order, or an addition?

Mr. Potter: Here are the items under the second division (referring to memorandum) 1825, for a guard house; 1834 for grading the grounds around the Capitol Square; 1838, water system; 1851, gas system; 1855, approaches—

The Special Master: What are you giving—the years or the amounts? Taking the amounts that make the aggregate $1,- 456,091, I wish you would tell what they are for, and give the 992 amounts that make up the $12,247.

Mr. Potter: I was giving the amounts of the $12,247. I have not the details of that other amount.

The Special Master: If you have not, you will submit that later, and submit it for their inspection?

Mr. Potter: These amounts have been agreed on with them.

The Special Master: I understand, but what I want is this. I suppose both of you may want to discuss the question of whether they may be called a maintenance charge or not. In order to give that, we may want the details showing just what was done. For instance, if any of the moeny was expended by the acquisition of additional land, that might be one thing. If it was expended for the purpose of keeping in repair during that year, that might be quite another thing. Mr. Dixey, you notice what I say about that. You will have no trouble about that?

Mr. Dixey: None at all.

The Special Master: The next is "Fugitive Slave Expenses."

Mr. Dixey: For the arrest of fugitive slaves.

Mr. Harrison: That explains itself.

The Special Master: Have you any suggestion about that, Mr. Potter?

Mr. Potter: Some part of that may be for the apprehension of fugitive slaves in other States.

The Special Master: That distinction is not worth discussing. That is the sum that was spent for apprehending fugitive slaves in Virginia and some outside Virginia. To my mind that is of no consequence, the question as to where they were arrested. I 993 do not think the geographical location of the expenditure would cut any figure whatever in that. Is there anything to be added there? If not, that is enough about that. The next is "Reward, Additional." That is in connection with the same thing, I suppose?

Mr. Potter: Reward for information leading to the conviction of persons carrying off slaves.

The Special Master: That is, rewards paid to people in connection with the enforcement of the fugitive slave law?

Mr. Potter: Yes.

The Special Master: Can there be anything added to that? If not, that is all we want about that. That settles that matter. Now, going to the next one. "Penitentiary Lot and New Hospital Building." Is that all that can be said about it?

Mr. Potter: Yes.

The Special Master: Is there anything further on that, Mr. Potter? If not, we will pass to the next item. "Items of Indian Defense in 1834-1835;" and the next "Calling out Militia at Wheeling in 1838." Can anything be added to that?

Mr. Potter: I think not.

The Special Master: Can you suggest anything that minimizes it? That is 1834, 1835 and 1838.

Mr. Potter: Do not confuse those two. Calling out the militia at Wheeling in 1838 is $1,099.

The Special Master: I am not confusing them. I am simply 994 saying there was $754 expended in 1834 and 1835 in defending against the Indians.

Mr. Carlisle: It was not paid until then, I suppose, although the occasion of the expenditure may have occurred long before then.

Mr. Potter: All I know is the payment was made then.

The Special Master: And the service rendered was sometimes anterior to that. Is there anything to be added to that? If not, we will pass to the next. "Calling out Militia at Wheeling in 1838."

Mr. Potter (reading from memorandum): "For which they should receive the usual pay of the militia when they were in actual service, etc."

The Special Master: Is there anything to be added to that? If not, we will go to the next item. "Medical College of Virginia, Additions and Improvements to Buildings, etc."

Mr. Potter (again referring to memorandum): "The Act creates, etc. (reading) "the hospital and infirmary for extending the college buildings."

The Special Master: That is undoubtedly additional.

Mr. Potter: The Act is March 1, 1860.

The Special Master: Improvements is used there for suggesting that the addition was an improvement, because, technically speaking, it was an addition. That is $25,000. The next is "Attorney General's Fees prosecuting Selden, Withers & Company." Who were Selden, Withers & Company?

Mr. Carlisle: They were defaulters, New York bankers.

Mr. Anderson: That means prosecuting a claim against 995 them, not criminally.

The Special Master: I understand.

Mr. Potter: It was paid under the Act of December 25, 1859, I think.

Mr. Anderson: And this was paid for conducting the lawsuit.

Mr. Potter: That is right.

The Special Master: The next is "Eastern and Western Asylums; Additions and Improvements to Buildings, etc., $363,845.56;" and "Support, $7,450.01;" making a total of $371,295.57. What is that "Support?"

Mr. McClintic: That is a question that is under dispute. We were speaking about that awhile ago.

The Special Master: The support proposition?

Mr. McClintic: No—

The Special Master: "Additions and Improvements to Buildings, etc., $363,845.56." Are those the same kind of additions involved in these other items?

Mr. Potter: Yes, sir; but the item of support—

The Special Master: I will come to that in a moment. That is all there is to be said about that; so far as they are called improvements it is in the sense that an addition is an improvement. Now, "Support," what is that for?

Mr. Potter: For annual support the State appropriated so much each year.

The Special Master: The annual appropriations in the maintenance of this institution. Do you agree to that?

Mr. McClintic: That is correct.

Mr. Potter: I think it is merely an omission on the part of 996 our friends.

The Special Master: There is an opportunity for repentance, between now and the argument, and they can make that confession if they have a mind to; and if they do not make it and I decide against them, it can go in. The next is "Gun House at Alexandria" and "Cannon House, Surry county." I suppose that is the same sort of an investment, $110.

Mr. Potter: The same thing.

The Special Master: The next is "Gun House for Richmond Artillery, $1,079.09."

Mr. Potter: The same.

The Special Master: The next is "Sundry Board of Public Work Expenses, as follows." Is there anything to be added to any of these items except matters disclosed in the items themselves?

Mr. Potter: Not entirely. The printing of bonds is not the entire cost of printing bonds. As I understand it, the defendants have included the printing of registered bonds, and this is the printing of coupon bonds and the engraving of the coupon bonds.

The Special Master: That is, they have included the printing of the registered bonds, and you have included the printing of registered bonds and coupon bonds.

Mr. Potter: Yes.

The Special Master: Do you agree on that?

Mr. McClintic: We are handicapped by illness of Mr. Scoville on that.

The Special Master: I say this. Mr. Dixey may look that 997 up and if there is anything you want to call my attention to in reference to that, that may be done later. Is there anything else to be said about those items?

Mr. Potter: No, sir, I think not.

Mr. McClintic: No, sir.

The Special Master: As to those items, the case is closed. Now, let us take up the next paragraph, which is Paragraph No. 5, I think. As to that, I understand the experts have not been able to reach any result.

Mr. Carlisle: Before that, stated by the defendant's counsel on Exhibit C-1, on page 8—

The assessed valuation of Slaves for 1860 and 1861, not appearing on the original Assessment Rolls, it is agreed by the parties to this cause that in those counties for which no returns are found for 1862 and 1863, the number of slaves reported for 1860 and 1861 shall be taken and their value estimated on the basis of the average value of all Slaves in counties for which both number and value is reported in 1862 and 1863, making a separate calculation for each State.

Where number of slaves but no assessed valuation is reported in 1862 and 1863 the same average value as above is used.

We hereby certify that the within tables, consisting of pages 5 to 8 following, of which the above is a Summary, are taken from the original Assessment Rolls of the Commonwealth of Virginia, so far as available and from Auditors reports in other cases; that the said Summary is composed of items taken from the latest obtainable authentic sources of information prior to June 20th, 1863, and that the method adopted as above, of valuing the Slaves in those counties for which no value is shown in 1860 and 1861 is fair to both parties.

NOTE: The valuation of slaves for 1860 and 1861 is based on the average assessed valuation of slaves in 1862 and 1863, as shown by the original assessment rolls of counties reporting both the number and value.

Such values are:

For Virginia,	$501.60
For West Virginia,	488.25

Certified Correct:

CLIFFORD E. SCOVILLE, THOMAS BIRD DIXCY,
For the Defendant.

Plaintiff objects to the use of the average assessed valuation of Slaves in 1862 and 1863 as a basis of their assessed valuation in 1860 and 1861, as the Records of the Commonwealth of Virginia clearly show that slaves were assessed in the last mentioned years at 40c per $100 of value and as the tax levied on all slaves over 12 years was $1.20, their assessed valuation was $300; and for the further reason that in 1862 and 1863 the assessed value of the slaves in Virginia was estimated with reference to Confederate money as a standard of value.

We have checked all figures in this exhibit consisting of pages 1, 2, and 3, and find them to be correct.

Other Evidence and Proceedings Relating to Paragraph V of the Decree.

[Vol. 5, Nov. 16, 1909.]

TESTIMONY ON BEHALF OF COMPLAINANT UNDER PARAGRAPH V OF THE DECREE.

ARTHUR G. POTTER,
testified as follows: 66

By Mr. Anderson:

Q. Please examine this schedule, marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit E 1," and state what that statement embraces, the sources from which it was derived, and your knowledge as to the correctness of the statement in general and in particular.

A. The statement is a division of the sum total of the ordinary expenses of Government in the preceding exhibit, namely, forty million dollars, on the basis of a fair estimated valuation of the real and personal property. The estimated valuations of the real and personal property are shown in what we call Article II—I believe it is Exhibit B—and is based on the same figures that were used in that schedule.

Q. That is, you predicate this result from the statements contained in Plaintiff's Exhibit B 1?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Robinson: Partially.

Mr Anderson: And upon the population.

The Special Master: Yes; so far as it is necessary.

By Mr. Anderson:

Q. This includes personal property as well as real property?

A. Personal property.

Q. How did you estimate the value of the personal pro- 67
perty, and of what date, and how did you ascertain it?

A. Certain of the counties made returns of personal property in 1863, and certain of them did not. We took those that did make returns, and from the—do you want me to explain the exact method by which I arrived at it?

Q. I did not ask that now. The question is whether that statement is correct, and from what sources it was derived.

The Special Master: Your question would involve all the answer he has given. You might as well state it fully and give your reasons as you go along. Put it in, concretely and concisely.

A. We had the personal property returns in 77 counties for 1863. I understand these returns were in Confederate money. We reduced that to gold—

By The Special Master:

Q. As of what date?

A. As of February, 1863, which was the date of the assessment. On that date we ascertained that one dollar in gold was worth four dollars Confederate. We reduced the Confederate valuation to gold. Then we took the valuation of 1861 and determined the percentage of shrinkage.

Q. Do you apply the same percentage to the remaining counties that appeared to apply to the 77?

A. No; there was an intermediate step. We determined the percentage of shrinkage. Then we took the 33 counties of 1861, and applied that percentage of shrinkage and got at the value of those for 1863. Adding the two together gave us the valuation of personal property in 1863, as of February, which was the date 68 of the assessment.

By Mr. Conrad:

Q. Are not those explanations you are now making all set out and printed in that slip itself?

A. Yes, sir; on page 3.

By Mr. Anderson:

Q. What do you know as to the correctness of the statements in that schedule, Mr. Potter? Did you verify them?

A. I made these personally—all of them.

Q. Did you compare them with the original records?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. State whether that is a correct statement of the principles upon which it is stated, as set for forth upon the paper itself.

A. I believe it is.

Mr. Anderson: That paper may be filed. That is all we think it will be necessary to introduce in support of this paragraph. It is based upon what is known as the Commissioner of Revenue—the land books returned by the Commissioner of Revenue for each year.

The Special Master: They are public records, open to the inspection of the other side?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir; open to the inspection of the other side.

The Special Master: Do you wish to ask any questions, gentlemen?

By Mr. Spooner:

Q. I did not understand exactly how you got at that $23,-042,230, estimated personal property in Virginia and $24,406,- 69
681, in West Virginia.

A. The assessed valuation of personal property in West Virginia I took from the reports of the Auditor. I will have to look at my papers, if you will permit me.

Q. Certainly.

A. The 33 counties in West Virginia I took from the West Virginia's Auditor's report, in the West Virginia Journal of 1863, page 324, assessments of 1862.

Q. What is the date of that Auditor's report?

A. Auditor's report, Journal of 1863.

Q. You do not know the date?

The Special Master: You mean the house journal. You say the journal of 1863.

A. No; it is a volume of Auditor's reports that I found in the library at Charleston.

Mr. Conley: It is published in the Journal of the House of Delegates or Senate.

A. The Journal of 1863.

By Mr. Anderson:

Q. You mean the ledger of 1863, do you not?

A. All my memoranda show are the Auditor's report in the Journal of 1863—that is right; the Journal of the House of Delegates.

By Mr. Spooner:

Q. How much did you find to be the value of personal property in Virginia without the reduction to the basis of the value in Confederate money?

A. In 73 counties it was $70,566,000.

Q. Can you state separately how much of that was money 70 and how much was other personal property?

A. No, sir; the reports merely give it in totals.

Mr. Anderson: The report only gives the totals.

A. Only the totals. I do not give any details in that.

By Mr. Conrad:

Q. Your report shows the sources of your information, where the sources can be found, does it not?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. Spooner:

Q. What percentage did you reduce the valuation of personal property in Virginia to as contradistinguished from West Virginia?

A. What percentage?

Q. Yes; you said it was $77,000,000. You brought it down to $23,000,000 and something. What was the principle on which you made that reduction? I only want to get at your methods?

A. The $70,000,000, was reduced to gold on a basis of four to one.

Q. You assumed that all of that $70,000,000 was money?

A. Oh, no; personal property—the value of personal property in 73 Virginia counties as stated in the report.

By the Special Master:

Q. Your assumption is it was computed in Confederate money?

A. Not my assumption; no, sir. I did not assume anything. I was informed by the counsel for Virginia. 71

Q. It is immaterial as to how you get it. You proceeded on the hypothesis that the personal property was estimated in Confederate money?

A. That the assessments were made in Confederate money.

By Mr. Spooner:

Q. You did not get that very important information, then, either from the published reports or from any records of the State?

A. No, I did not.

By the Special Master:

Q. That is, was there any public document that made that statement?

A. No, sir; none that I have seen.

Mr. Conrad: The Master would almost take judicial notice of that, as a matter of history, pretty much on the basis that Chief Justice Chase proceeded in Harrington against Smith, in North Carolina. The published history of the country shows that the only currency in this region at that period was the Confederate currency. Gold was a commodity. Greenbacks were a commodity. Confederate money alone was current here, and all the assessments of property were made in Confederate money. I say the Master might safely take judicial notice of that as a matter of public history.

Mr. Spooner: I was only trying to get at the facts as to how these estimates were made.

Mr. Anderson: We call the attention of your Honor and of counsel to the fact that our statement with regard to all of this personalty as to which this scale, as it is called, applied, reducing the value estimated in Confederate money to the value estimated 72 in lawful money, in specie—not gold, but specie, gold and silver being then on a par with each other—is supported by the legislation at that time. The legislation of the Richmond Government, which controlled this whole region during all this period, provided that the land assessments should remain the same, the assessment of 1856, subject to such changes as might be necessitated by reason of new improvements or the destruction of improvements, while personal property was assessed annually at its then current value; and taxes, by the express mandate of the statute, were payable in Confederate money, defining what Confederate money was. Taxes were payable in Confederate money and the assessments, as will appear from comparison, were made in Confederate money. The assessments, I will say to my friends, were very much larger in nominal amount in 1863 than they were prior to the beginning of the war, but very much smaller in the quantity of property, as will be seen on an examination of the Commissioner's books, because of the fact that by the disastrous operation of the war then prevailing throughout this territory, there was an enormous destruction of personal property, and it will be found also that there was a great diminution in the quantity of personal property that was assessed, while there was a nominal appreciation in values, a horse being estimated to be worth, in 1861, in the then lawful money, from $20 to $50, and in 1863, $150 or $200, perhaps—certainly $150, an increase of five hundred per cent. sometimes, in the subject of taxation in the nominal assessment, while the real value had been de- 73
preciated very greatly. The witness has taken the very highest value at which Confederate money was sold during that period, four for one, while the fact is, I want to say to my friends, that in June, when the assessment was in fact made, the value was eight or nine to one. The fortunes of the Confederacy were waning. Stonewall Jackson fell in the month of May, and from that time the value of Confederate money, which depended entirely upon the ultimate success of the Confederate Government, depreciated rapidly; but we take the assessment at the very highest rate in Virginia at that time, four for one.

The Special Master: The important point at this stage of the hearing is that the other side should be advised of the hypothesis and the theory upon which the statement is predicated. Later, if they think they have occasion to criticize either the hypothesis or the report, I will hear them. Of course they now have notice of exactly what your contention is.

Mr. Spooner: I would like to ask another question.

Mr. Anderson: The first act as to Confederate currency was in 1862, and the last was in 1863, before this assessment became effective.

By Mr. Spooner:

Q. Did you make any deductions in the estimates of the value of personal property in West Virginia on account of the appreciation of gold?

A. We made no deduction of any kind for West Virginia 74 counties. The report states that the figures were taken from the Auditor's report of 1862.

By Mr. Conrad:

Q. Is that West Virginia now?

A. Yes; and a few of the counties which were not returned in that report from the old Virginia statements of 1861.

Mr. Mollohan: Not West Virginia?

Mr. Anderson: Yes; West Virginia.

Mr. Mollohan: No; there was no West Virginia then.

Mr. Conrad: That raises a large question, that we are not going into at this time.

Mr. Anderson: It refers to the counties now constituting West Virginia.

Mr. Mollohan: Counties that you owned yourself.

Mr. Conrad: Who appropriated the money derived from taxation by those assessments?

Mr. McClintic: The State of Virginia.

Mr. Anderson: Are there any other questions, gentlemen?

Mr. Spooner: I did not mean to interrupt you.

By Mr. Anderson:

Q. I understand, Mr. Potter, you said this statement is correct.

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Anderson: I will ask that it be filed.

(The paper referred to, entitled "Commonwealth of Virginia vs. State of West Virginia. Fair Estimated valuation of the property, real and personal. Article V." is filed herewith, marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit E-1.") 75

Mr. Anderson: We are through on that statement, if the Master please, except that I wish to give your Honor—and I will furnish a copy of it to my friends on the other side—a citation of the acts of the Richmond Government of Virginia, providing that all taxes should be paid in Confederate money, and also the act providing that all the lands should continue at the former antebellum assessments, while personal property should be reassessed annually at its annual value.

(The paper referred to was subsequently forwarded by Mr. Anderson, and is filed herewith, marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit E-2.")

[Vol. 4. May 5, 1909. Cross Examination A. G. Potter.] 377

Mr. Carlisle: There are some questions I want to ask the witness at this time.

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. Mr. Potter, I will not go through the entire process adopted by you in ascertaining the assessed value either of the land or the personal property in these two States.

Mr. Anderson: Which schedule are you looking at?

Mr. Carlisle: Schedule 5.

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. Do you find that the assessed value of personal property in what now constitutes the State of Virginia in 1863 was $23,042,230, and you find that the assessed value of personal property in West Virginia at the same time was $24,406,681, or considerably over $1,000,000 more than the assessed value of the personal property in the State of Virginia, with its hundred counties. 378 In order to ascertain that result, you took the assessed value of the personal property as shown by such records as were accessible to you, and you divided that by four. Why did you do that?

A. Because I was informed by counsel that this assessment was in Confederate money in Virginia.

Q. Is that all the information you had upon the subject? Have you seen any law of the State of Virginia authorizing assessments to be made in Confederate money?

A. No, sir.

Q. There was a law in the State, which we all know, authorizing the owner to pay his taxes in Confederate money, but there was no law authorizing the assessment in Confederate money.

Mr. Conrad: But we all know, as a matter of fact, that it was assessed in Confederate money.

Mr. Carlisle: You say you know it as a matter of fact. I do not know it.

Mr. Conrad: We can prove it.

Mr. Carlisle: I see by comparing that assessment with the assessment in West Virginia that personal property is assessed about the same.

Mr. Anderson: Both those were Confederate assessments.

The Special Master: Where does the statement appear in this report about his having divided by four?

Mr. Carlisle: In the whole statement here.

The Witness: It is on the last page.

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. There was a law authorizing the taxpayer to discharge 379 his obligations to the State for taxes on personal property by paying in Confederate money, but no law in regard to the assessment in Confederate money. Now, as a matter of fact, do you know whether the taxes on the land were also paid in Confederate money?

A. I do not.

The Special Master: The question now is whether the witness has any knowledge of how the taxes were paid.

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. Why did you divide the valuation on personal property by four and not divide the assessment on the land by four, although they were on the same footing?

Mr. Conrad: There was no assessment of land after 1866. Personal property was assessed every year.

Mr. Carlisle: But there was no law to assess it in Confederate money.

Mr. Conrad: Land was not assessed in Confederate money.

Mr. Carlisle: Neither was personal property, according to the law.

Mr. Conrad: Yes; it was. We can explain it.

Mr. Carlisle: It certainly requires explanation.

Mr. Anderson: Land was assessed in 1856, the last time, in gold.

Mr. Conrad: The first case ever decided by the Chief Justice of the United States in North Carolina on circuit, was to the effect that although a bond was payable absolutely in money, still despite the seal, it was a Confederate transaction. There was no statute at all providing for it. There was no law that authorized them to do it. All business transactions in Virginia were on the basis of Confederate money, and it would have been 380 impossible after 1861 to assess personal property on greenbacks, gold, silver or anything but what was the sole money we had here. You could not have assessed it on a gold basis or a greenback basis. We did not have them. Their value here was a purely commercial value.

Mr. Carlisle: I do not see, Major, that that answers my question at all. Of course it is a well known rule of law that if transactions take place between individuals where the de facto government is existing, its law and customs control that transaction.

Mr. Conrad: Of course. Transactions that take place between the State government and its own citizens would not be put upon a different footing from transactions between citizens.

Mr. Carlisle: No; but there is no evidence here—

The Special Master: What Mr. Carlisle wants in the first instance is to develop the facts upon which the report is predicated. Then later as between yourselves if you do not agree, you will discuss your various contentions.

Mr. Carlisle: Yes, the argument will come hereafter.

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. It is a fact, then, that you divided the assessed valuation of the personal property by four?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And therefore reduced it from about $73,000,000 down to $23,000,000. That is a fact?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it is a fact that you did not divide the assessed valuation of the real estate by four?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. But you took them just as they stood?

A. Yes, sir. 381

Q. Just as you found them on the books?

A. Yes; just as they were reported on the land books and other sources of information from which we got these figures.

Mr. Carlisle: That is all I want—the facts.

The Special Master: Then, as I understand, except that the defense may wish to put a question or two that they have overlooked, this concludes the cross examination of Mr. Potter?

Mr. McClintic: No, we have schedules 6 and 7 yet, but we will not be long on those in the morning.

The Special Master: Very well, then, we will suspend here until 10 o'clock in the morning. I would like to have counsel for the defense and for the plaintiff go over these various schedules that have been presented so that between now and to-morrow morning the exhibits may be paged, so that they will be harmonious throughout, and we may refer to them later by exhibit and page. Mr. Dixcy has already paged the memoranda presented by the defendant.

The hearing, at 4:55 o'clock P. M., was adjourned until Thursday, May 6, 1909, at 10 o'clock A. M.

[Vol. 5. May 6, 1909.] 464

The Special Master: If there are any other documents of the same miscellaneous character we will mark them in the same way. Have you anything more, Brother Conrad? 465

Mr. Conrad: We are conferring as to whether a certain matter is properly in rebuttal or not. We know as a matter of fact that the assessments of personal property made from 1862 to the close of the war, were made based on Confederate money. It has been objected that there was no act authorizing that, but it is so, and it would have been impossible to have had an assessment on the gold basis or the greenback basis, beause we had none of that money in the State at that time.

Mr. Carlisle: From our inspection of the assessment of personal property at that time, we do not think that the value put upon it indicated that it was on a Confederate money basis.

Mr. Conrad: Well, we will reserve that evidence.

Mr. Anderson: That will be in rebuttal.

The Special Master: Then it is understood that as to that phase you rest until you hear from the other side?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1909. Direct Examination of T. B. Dixcy.] 546

Mr. McClintic: We now offer Defendant's Exhibit E-1.

(The paper referred to was received in evidence, marked "Defendant's Exhibit E-1.") 547

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. State, Mr. Dixcy, if you made up Defendant's Exhibit E-1.

A. Yes, sir; the schedules as presented were prepared by me, and the work was done under my direction and supervision, and bears my signature.

Q. The totals and percentages and other things therein were all made by you, were they?

A. Yes, sir; on page 2—entirely by me, and verified.

Q. The items appearing on page 3 and the following pages, as to the amount of the valuation of property—were they verified by you?

A. As to totals, yes, sir.

Q. Please state to the Commissioner what they were compiled from, beginning on page 3, as to real estate in Virginia?

A. The first item, for Alexandria, was taken from the auditor's report of 1860. The next 15 items, being the names of various counties, were taken from the auditor's report for 1861.

Q. That is shown on the face of the report itself.

A. That is shown on the schedule. The next three items are from the land books of 1861. I may say that we attempted to—

By the Special Master:

Q. It is all taken from the sources indicated in the statement?

A. Yes, sir. The endeavor was to obtain all the items that we could from the land books. We took them from other sources only where the land books were not available.

Q. The land books I understand are the duplicates of the original assessments?

Q. Made for the years indicated? 548

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And where you have not made statements here predicated upon the land books of 1863, is that because you could not find the land books for that year?

A. We were unable to find them; yes, sir.

Q. In that event, you found the land books for the nearest year?

A. The land books for the nearest year, or the auditor's report for the nearest year. We tried to obtain the assessed valuation as near to the date called for by the decree, as possible.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. On page 6, Mr. Dixey, comes the assessed valuation of the personal property in Virginia. Please state to the court how that was made, and from what sources?

A. That was made, as indicated on the face of the schedule, from the property books, in almost every case, as regards what is now the State of Virginia. The item at the end, for Chesterfield, was taken from the Auditor's report of 1863.

The Special Master: At the end, where?

A. At the end of the schedule on page 7.

Q. Please look at page 8, Mr. Dixey: —

By the Special Master:

Q. What is the distinction, right here, between property book and land book?

A. The property books contain personal property.

Q. Are there two sets of books, one containing real estate and the other personal property? 549

A. Yes, sir.

Q. One denominated land book and the other property book?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. As distinguishing personal property from real estate?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Anderson: And there was an annual assessment of personal property?

The Special Master: An annual valuation of personal property, but only a valuation by decades of real estate.

Mr. Anderson: The assessments of real estate was not at regular intervals. The last assessment of real estate was in 1856, and that assessment continued until 1870.

Mr. McClintic: To state the facts further, there was an annual land book made for each year, in which the assessors of each county added to for buildings erected and took off for buildings destroyed, or changes made by a county court, or anything like that? So that there was a land book each year.

Mr. Anderson: There was a slight change in the assessment.

The Special Master: Do I understand that except as there may have been changes in the character of the real estate, the land books continued from one assessment to another?

A. Yes, sir.

The Special Master: If there was a physical change as to 550 the construction of a building, that was allowed for in making the assessment, but otherwise the assessors took the assessed value for the preceding year, and continued until another general valuation was made. Is that right?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir; that is right.

The Special Master: But the personal property was assessed and valued every year?

Mr. Anderson: Every year.

Mr. Conrad: I have sent for a land book and a personal property book.

The Special Master: Yes; the practice is a little bit new to me, and I simply wanted to intelligently understand what the conditions were.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Please state from what this assessment on page 8 in West Virginia was obtained?

A. This is an assessment of personal property in West Virginia and was obtained from the sources indicated on the schedule at the heading of each class of items. I was about to say that the original entries in the property books were not available in so many cases as they were in what afterwards became the Virginia counties.

By the Special Master:

Q. In West Virginia, for instance, you have only six counties for property books of 1863?

A. Yes; those were on file here.

Q. Other than those, there were none on file?

A. No, sir.

Q. Was any effort made to get at the property books in the towns themselves? 551

A. I will say in regard to that, sir, that I think those things are all filed here. We found between 1830 and 1840, roughly, there were large cases in the basement, which we had open. They were all filled with these property books, and we went through those books individually endeavoring to get the nearest assessment made to 1863.

Q. As I understand, there were three duplicates, or there should have been, of both land and property books, one of which according to the law was filed here in the Capitol, one of which I suppose was kept by the assessors, or was supposed to be—

Mr. Conrad: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Supposed to be kept by the assessors as a permanent public record.

Mr. Conrad: Not by the assessors. It was filed in the county courts' clerks office and in the hustings court, the corporation courts of the town. There were three copies always made.

The Special Master: One copy went where?

Mr. Conrad: One copy came to Richmond, one copy was kept in the clerk's office, and the other copy—

Mr. McClintic: Went to the sheriff for the purpose of making up the tax figures.

Mr. Anderson: It went to the treasurer, who was at that time the sheriff.

The Special Master: The treasurer of what; the town or county?

Mr. McClintic: At that time, the sheriff of the county—

Since the War they have made a new title in this State, 552 but at that time the sheriff was a police officer and a fiscal officer.

The Special Master: My inquiry is whether in regard to the land books and property books any effort has been made to get at those books in those other two places of deposit, outside of the capitol here?

A. None on our part.

Mr. Conrad: They were very much deranged during the War in those regions that were open to the Armies.

The Special Master: That is very true, but has any effort been made on the part of either party to get at the other two of the triplicate set?

Mr. McClintic: If your Honor please, I looked at two or three counties in our State, and could not find them. Beyond that we did not make any further effort, so far as I know.

The Witness: I didn't know three copies were filed.

Mr. Anderson: They must have been sent to Wheeling during that time. There were thirty or forty counties.

The Special Master: The only question I had in mind was, first, whether any effort had been made to get at the other two of this triplicate set.

Mr. McClintic: I found, on examination, that the personal property books were not kept and they are not to-day kept more than three or four years back. Generally at the end of that period they have been destroyed. All the personal property books that went to the State of Virginia for that year were destroy- 553 ed years and years ago. Your Honor possibly knows that we have had a removal of our capital three times, and they did not keep those things. They simply dumped them away, as they did a whole lot of other books. So far as the counties are concerned, it is not customary for the counties to keep personal property books for very many years. I found that up to the seventies the personal property books had been destroyed. They got to be very voluminous, and as room was scarce, they threw them away. The land books as a rule are kept.

The Special Master: Has any effort been made to get at the original land books in these other places?

Mr. McClintic: The land books were based on the assessment of 1856, and it was not worth while to look for them, because we had the original appraisements, and the changes were infinitesimal from that time to 1863.

The Special Master: If it is agreed by both sides that the assessment that appears here for 1860 to 1861 as to the land can be adopted as the assessed value of land for 1853, that eliminates that element.

Mr. McClintic: There are some differences between Virginia's account and ours. I think they can be easily reconciled. I believe they are purely clerical.

The Special Master: I may say here that when it comes to questions of detail in connection with these two accounts, which ought to be reconcilable by reference back to the original sources of information, I may ask the accountants on both sides to get together for the purpose of ascertaining what the facts are in those cases. I cannot undertake to investigate those questions. The ac- 554 countants must do that for me; and that will apply to all the items involved in this account. Wherever there is any probability of ascertaining identity of items and identity of amount, where there is a disagreement in these accounts, unless there is some other arrangement made, I shall have to request the accountants to get together and see what they can find. If when they get together and they get the results, there are things they cannot agree on, of course I will determine those; but so far as they can reach common results from the original sources of information, I should like them to do it. That will winnow out a lot of those details.

Mr. Conrad: I will hand your Honor at this time an official publication which gives the form in each county and town of the State.

The Special Master: Let me ask this question right here, because while we are discussing this, if we can make progress, we had better do it. Is it agreed by counsel on both sides that the assessed value of the real estate, as it may appear, either by the land records of 1861 or 1860 or 1863, can be treated as the assessed value on June 20, 1863. That is, are you near enough together?

Mr. Anderson: We are willing that the nearest authentic assessment that can be found shall be taken. We have endeavored to do that.

The Special Master: Is it agreed on both sides?

Mr. Conrad: I think we are shut up to it on both sides. 555
The last assessment of land made before the War both for Virginia and West Virginia was in 1856. That ran until 1866, unless West Virginia had a reassessment of land and I do not think she did.

The Special Master: She could not have had any reassessment before 1863.

Mr. Conrad: We are bound by that.

The Special Master: I know, but I do not want to bother the court with all these names, provided I can have it appear in the record that the parties on either side agree. Of course all these reasons would undoubtedly satisfy the court it is all right. What I want now, if I can safely do it, is to put into the record the statement agreed to by counsel on both sides, that the valuations that appear here for any other year than 1863 will be accepted by both sides as the valuation under this paragraph for June 20, 1863, except with this suggestion. If there are any items as to which there is a disagreement in the reports of the two accountants, the understanding is that the accountants are to get together. Is that agreed upon?

Mr. Harrison: They are to reconcile them if they can.

The Special Master: Yes; they are to reconcile them if they can. If not, I will get the result, and I will determine then in those particular instances what the fact is.

Mr. McClintic: If your Honor please, there is only one difficulty in that and I do not know whether we can arrange it or not. The West Virginia counties, as shown by the exhibit originally filed here by the accountant for Virginia, had 45,000 square miles. That same exhibit, taken from the Auditor's report of 1861, showed that there were counties in West Virginia, as we can prove by the United States Geological Bureau, which only have 480 miles in 556 them, and in that exhibit they had them as 1,500 square miles. The reason for that was that the Auditor's report says that in many instances they were taken by adding the acreage of the lands assessed in each county together, and that made so many acres, and that made so many square miles. The facts are that West Virginia and Virginia at that time assessed titles instead of land, and there are in a great many cases simply duplications. In other words, there would be a half a dozen people claiming a hundred thousand acres of land. Each one of that half dozen had on the books his hundred thousand acres of land, in order to keep his title. That makes a very grave duplication in West Virginia; but on the face of the books the assessed valuation appears as so much.

The Special Master: Well, how can I do anything else except report the assessed valuation? Of course I appreciate the force of those considerations, but I presume they went all over the State, did they not?

Mr. McClintic: That applies to the wild lands, so-called, and the doubtful titles. Virginia has two systems of land titles, one west of the Alleghenies and the other east of the Alleghenies. We belonged west of the Alleghenies. They had what was known as an inclusive survey west of the Alleghenies. In other words, a man could go out onto Barren Creek and survey a hundred thousand acres and say "I exclude all previous entries, surveys and grants." 557

Mr. Anderson: We had that on the east side, too.

Mr. McClintic: Those things were duplicated and duplicated.

The Special Master: Let us see where we would land on that. There is to be presented to me what will be and is by these reports the assessed valuation. Now, is the assessed valuation, so far as it relates to the territory of West Virginia, to be attacked upon the ground that this practice was adopted, and that it resulted in the assessment? If you are going to be bound by the assessment, that is all there is of it, if I am to report the assessment as it stands. If you desire to open up that question, then I will hear you upon that.

Mr. Anderson: If your Honor please, the difference between those two assessments is very slight.

The Special Master: I do not want counsel on either side to agree to any fact that is going to embarrass them in any way, or to deprive them of any right.

Mr. Anderson: The amount is very small. The difference in the result as ascertained by the accountants for Virginia and West Virginia is only .088 of one per cent. Therefore it is de minimis.

The Special Master: It is important for me, and for you gentlemen later on.

Mr. Anderson: We are perfectly willing to take that statement.

The Special Master: You do not want negligible elements of controversy when you get this up in the Supreme Court, 558 and I do not want to bother the Supreme Court with unnecessarily small details.

Mr. Anderson: As to what my friend Mr. McClintic said just now with reference to the manner in which this excessive or fictitious area was arrived at, I have no doubt he is correct. The same thing occurred in Virginia. Both in West Virginia, west of the Alleghenies and in Virginia, failure to put their claims on the land books resulted in forfeiture of title to the land, according to the law of the State; and in order to save their title to land, they had titles that were worth little or nothing put upon the land books. Sometimes there would be five or six claims to the same land, and they were assessed at nominal amounts, frequently insignificant amounts, sometimes a cent an acre or less.

The Special Master: I have got to do one of two things. I must take the public record of this assessment, or I must allow the public record to be impeached. I do not know what you may have, but it is almost incredible to my mind that you could have living evidence by which you could establish the instances in which the assessors had assessed land under these circumstances in particular cases. Of course you may have it.

Mr. McClintic: We could prove that without difficulty in numbers of instances. Whether it is a provable matter or not is another thing.

The Special Master: That would be another question. The assessed value, of course, is what I must report under this pargaraph.

value of land on June 20, 1863.

Mr. Anderson: We are willing that that should be done, sir.

Mr. McClintic: We will confer and let your Honor know this afternoon.

The Special Master: I merely make the suggestion. None of you need feel bound to make any of these agreements which I suggest. It is only for the purpose of saving myself work, and saving the court work later.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Are the totals of the personal property assessments as set out on the bottom of page 7 correct?

A. You mean in this summary? 560

Q. Yes.

A. The total assessment?

Q. Yes.

A. They are correct according to the sources of information from which we took them, as shown by the schedule.

The Special Master: I would like to have that same suggestion with reference to agreement apply to the personal property as well as to the land. Of course you are not obliged to agree to it, but I merely suggest it. Of course I appreciate the fact that the personal property raises quite different considerations. But we have got to do one of two things. Of course in the absence of getting the assessment for the year 1863, we would have to approximate it in some way, by some competent testimony, and if the only competent testimony you have was the assessment for 1860, and you have to leave the case there, so that I have got to infer, you might as well agree on it and eliminate that as an element of controversy.

Of course I do not direct the course of the hearing, but when it comes to me, if there is nothing before me except the assessment of 1860 to show the value of the personal property in 1863, I should have to come pretty near finding that that is the value in 1863. Of course you have the property book, if you want to supplement it by any additional testimony. We are not discussing actual value; this is assessed value, and I cannot report actual values. 561

Mr. Conrad: The only thing we can do is to lay before you the official reports.

The Special Master: I don't know—on the basis of a fair estimate of valuation of property.

Mr. Conrad: That is another thing. All we can do upon this assessed valuation is to furnish you with the official publications—and please note that they are as well the official publications of the people of West Virginia as they are of the people of Virginia at the time they were made in 1863. Now, if an assessment of land appears we know it existed in 1856 and continued.

The Special Master: I do not know that I am confined to the assessed valuation of the personal property.

(Reading):

"5. And also on the basis of the fair estimated valuation of the property, real and personal, by counties of the State of Virginia."

Of course if all you give me is the assessed valuation of 1860, and stop there, and that is all the evidence I have, I may have to take it.

Mr. Spooner: We move to amend that—

The Special Master: I only suggest that. You can go on with the examination. As to whether you both think it prudent, in the interest of progress, and certainty in the result, to agree upon this question of the valuation as to land and personal property, that is something you will have to decide for yourselves. I simply make the suggestion. You may proceed.

Mr. Spooner: We moved to amend that by making it read "assessed valuation." In the Supreme Court's report in connection with these proceedings that word "assessed" is put in.

Mr. Anderson: If your Honor please, that is only the sec- 562 ond paragraph that the word "assessed" occurs.

The Special Master: In the second paragraph the word "assessed" does not appear in the decree as I have it. What I have here is a certified copy of the order on which I am acting, signed by the clerk of the court.

Mr. Spooner: That was amended.

The Special Master: Let us find out where we are. His certificate is dated June 5, 1908, under the seal of the court.

Mr. Spooner: I am not making any mistake about this.

The Special Master: Probably not, but there is one thing certain; if this authority is not corr t the proper authority will have to make it correct.

Mr. Spooner: It has been made correct.

The Special Master: But they must make it correct to me. I had in mind all the while that it read "assessed" but when I come to look at this certified copy of the decree I see that the word "assessed" is not there. I will have to communicate with the clerk of the court. I will have it sent back and amended . Of course, this is my authority, this copy I have.

Mr. Anderson: Under the fifth paragraph of the decree, 563 your Honor shall estimate the fair estimated valuation of the property, real and personal, by counties, of the State of Virginia—the fair estimated valuation. There is no suggestion that the assessed value shall be taken as a criterion in that paragraph.

But if your Honor please, when we come to endeavor to ascertain fairly on each side, what was the fair valuation of property on the 20th of June, 1863, it was found to be an absolutely unsolvable problem, and the nearest approach we could get to a value was to take the assessed valuation. Your Honor will understand very well that very few men are old enough to have been in active business then. So it would take the testimony of thousands of men to prove what the assessed value of property in those two States was at that time.

The Special Master: I appreciate that fully.

Mr. Anderson: So it was very difficult. But in taking the assessed valuation we found that here was this difference between the assessed valuation in loyal West Virginia and in the Confederate Virginia—or in Federal West Virginia and Confederate Virginia, I would rather say; because both were right according to the principles which they followed and which it seemed to them to be constitutional.

The Special Master: I accept the change, although I noticed the inadvertence when you made it.

Mr. Anderson: I will put quotation marks around the word "loyal" in the first instance. The assessment there was in reference to lawful money of the United States. It was the money in which the taxes paid to the Wheeling Government were paid in 1863 and 1864; while in Virginia it was transparently 564 evident that the assessments placed by the sworn officers of the Government here had reference to some other standard of value than gold or silver.

Mr. McClintic: Gold was not a standard of value in West Virginia. It was not known then.

Mr. Hogg: It was a curiosity.

Mr. Anderson: So were greenbacks here a curiosity, and illegal as a circulating medium. Comparing the two assessments, you will see that horses were assessed for three or four times as much in 1863 as they were in 1860, although horses in 1860 were worth less in lawful money. So it was evident that the assessments here were made with reference to Confederate money as a standard. In order to ascertain the fair valuation it was necessary to apply the scale adopted by the courts, and that is what we did in reaching our conclusions.

The Special Master: That is another question. The only practical question here is whether between yourselves you will agree, first, upon taking the assessed valuation of the land for the valuation and for what will be the fair estimated valuation under paragraph 5, and then, whether at the same time you will agree that the assessments of personal property you put in shall be treated by me as of 1863; and so far as they go, unless you see fit to supplement them by other evidence to be taken by me as to the valuation of the personal property. You can make that agreement if you like, and reserve the right of Virginia to assert the proposition for which they contend, that for obvious reasons the valuation was excessive and ought to be reduced. That is independent of the ques- 565 tion what the figures themselves show. Of course when I come to report to the court, if I report a valuation for 1861, I have to give some reason why I reach a conclusion in 1863; and if you both stop on 1861 and do not undertake to go further, I might as well have it as a matter of agreement in the record. I only make these suggestions and I want counsel, if they think they can do so with safety and propriety to join me in having an agreement that will eliminate this element of controversy.

Mr. Spooner: We understand your Honor's suggestion and we will consider it with an earnest desire to come to an adjustment about it, and we will not take a great deal of time in considering it either. One of these statements of personal property, as I recollect, embraces 30 odd counties, the assessment of 1860 or 1861.

Mr. McClintic: 1861 and 1862.

Mr. Spooner: 1861 and 1862. Then the other counties of Virginia are reported from the assessment roll of 1863. That is upon the theory that they have been unable to find a complete record for 1863. We shall ask to put in a statement of assessment of 1861 and also a statement of the assessed value in 1863.

The Special Master: Well, that question of fixing a valuation of 1861 would be a question addressed to the discretion of the Master.

Mr. Spooner: Yes; that is true.

The Special Master: That is something I will hear you upon when you reach it. That will not present any difficulty so far as the land is concerned, because the statement made by both 566 sides, as I understand it, is that the valuation of the land in 1861 was practically the same as in 1863—substantially the same, with some few changes.

Mr. McClintic: What did this assessment of personal property, in a general way, include?

Mr. Anderson: What page are you on?

Mr. McClintic: Page 6.

The Special Master: You mean assessments in both places, Virginia and West Virginia?

Mr. McClintic: Yes; the general subject matters assessed in each State.

The Witness: Well, as far as I itemized they were slaves, horses, mules, asses, jennies, pleasure carriages, cattle, sheep, hogs, watches, clocks, pianos and harps.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Is that what the assessment rolls show as being the subject matter of assessment?

A. The assessment rolls show those in detail.

Q. And other details?

A. And other details in addition, but not separate.

Q. Those classes were shown on each assessment roll, and they are assessed separately under those heads?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That is true of each State?

A. Yes, sir.

The Special Master: I see that they do not assess household furniture in those States. You may proceed.

Mr. Conrad: I just asked him if that is not personal property you are examining about.

The Special Master: Is that one of the original valuation books (indicating book)?

(The Special Master and counsel examined some books).

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1909. Cross Examination of T. B. Dixcy.]

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. How did you ascertain the fair proportion of the ordi- 654 nary expenses to be borne by West Virginia, on the basis of the fair estimated value of property, real and personal, by counties? Is that shown by your Exhibit E-1?

A. We substituted the assessed valuation, for we certainly were incompetent to make a fair estimated valuation, and we used the same basis that Virginia used?

Q. You did?

A. Well, practically so.

Q. Did you make a comparison between the assessed values of personal property in Virginia in 1861 and 1862 and 1863?

A. In 1861, 1862 and 1863?

Q. Yes.

A. It was made. I did not make it personally, but I instructed it to be made, I think I have seen the result. I am not quite sure whether they were made or not. My impression is they were.

Q. You are not able to testify about them yourself?

A. I am not sure whether I saw them or not. There were some papers handed to me since this hearing commenced, and I am not sure what they were. I instructed them to be made, and I assume they have been made, but I did not give them any attention. 655

The Special Master: You are on Defendant's Exhibit E-1 now, are you, Mr. Harrison?

Mr. Harrison: E-1; yes, sir.

The Special Master: Paragraph 5.

Mr. Harrison: On the basis of the fair estimated value of the property.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. You included in the assessed valuation of personal property slaves?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you made no deduction on account of the depreciation in currency?

A. No, sir.

Q. Those two considerations would probably cover substantially the difference between your result and the result shown on Mr. Potter's statement, would they not?

A. I assume that they would. On personal property we did not get all of our figures from the same sources. We discovered a lot of personal property books and took them over there. I think Mr. Potter had not seen them. The books were not open. We found them down in the basement of the Capitol and had them opened and went through those.

[Vol. 7. July 1, 1909. General Discussion.]

[The Special Master]: We come now to Paragraph 5. Have you a substitute exhibit there for plaintiff's original Exhibit E-1?

Mr. Harrison: That relates to the fair estimated value of the property, real and personal, does it not?

The Special Master (reading from decree): "And also on 842 the basis of the fair estimated valuation of the property, real and personal, by counties of the State of Virginia."

Have you reached any agreement on that?

Mr. Dixey: We cannot determine that until the preceding one is determined, because it involves the ordinary expenses the same as the preceding one.

Mr. Harrison: It does not involve the method by which you reached the fair estimated value.

The Special Master: Have you or have you not reached an agreement on that paragraph?

Mr. Anderson: No, sir. There are a great many points of disagreement there.

The Special Master: Are those matters that the experts have gone over, or are they matters which they can go over with any hope or expectation of reaching a reconcilement?

Mr. Anderson: I think they are almost entirely as to classification and as to the construction of these decrees.

Mr. Harrison: The fair estimated value is, of course, a question of facts.

The Special Master: That involves a question of fact as to whether you agree on it.

Mr. McClintic: We will not agree on that—the fair estimated value.

The Special Master: Do I understand, then, that there is not any prospect of reaching an agreement on what is the fair estimated valuation of the property, real and personal, by counties, of the State of Virginia? 843

Mr. Carlisle: I believe we agree on the value of the real property.

Mr. McClintic: The assessed value of the real property.

Mr. Carlisle: Yes.

The Special Master: I am going to report the fair estimated valuation. Now, then, if counsel for Virginia and West Virginia agree that the assessed valuation is the nearest that you can both approximate to the fair estimated valuation, I will report that as the fact. If you do not agree on that, I will hear either of you on any phase of that.

Mr. Harrison: It is upon that point that we want to introduce some testimony.

The Special Master: The first question is, do you agree on the assessed valuation?

Mr. Anderson: We do not think that is a fair criterion.

The Special Master: I do not ask you to bind yourselves as to what is a fair criterion, but the first question is this. I suppose you both rely in some stage of the contention that either of you may have on this proposition, upon the element of assessed value?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Now, what weight or force may be given is a matter to be determined later on by me, after hearing both parties. Now what I want to know is whether, as to the figures the assessed valuation show, whether you agree on them.

Mr. Carlisle: We do not agree as to the assessed valuation of the personal property.

The Special Master: Let us confine it to the real estate.

Mr. McClintic: We have agreed on the real estate. 844

The Special Master: Do I understand, Brother Attorney General, that you agree on the assessed valuation of the real estate?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: I do not understand that by making that valuation that that is the valuation I am to take. If that is the case, that eliminates that from that sum—what is the amount?

Mr. McClintic: It is set out in Section 2.

Mr. Anderson: $82,000,000 for West Virginia, and I think $290,000,000 for Virginia, and something.

The Special Master: Under Paragraph 5 of the decree we are to determine "and also on the basis of the fair estimated valuation of the property, real and personal, by counties, of the State of Virginia." Now, give me, if you can put your hand on it in a minute, what the assessed valuation is.

Mr. McClintic: It is stated in B-1.

Mr. Harrison: In Virginia the assessed valuation was $296,085,460.31.

Mr. Carlisle: That is real estate only.

Mr. Harrison: Yes.

The Special Master: And what are the figures as to West Virginia?

Mr. Harrison: West Virginia, $82,449,252.04.

The Special Master: Yes; I had not read that. We need not spend any more time on that. That is already agreed to.

Mr. Harrison: We agree as to the amounts of the assessed valuation of the real estate.

The Special Master: The agreement does not bind you any 845 further than that. If I find in the end that the assessed valuation is the fair valuation, I shall find so; if I find that the assessed valuation is not the fair valuation, then I shall so find. If I think it is a factor that should be taken into account, I will take it into account, and not otherwise. Now, as to the personal valuation.

Mr. Harrison: There is a wide disagreement.

The Special Master: There is a wide disagreement as to the valuation of personal property.

Mr. Carlisle: There is a wide disagreement; yes, sir.

The Special Master: There may be a wide disagreement as to the fair valuation of personal property, but is there a wide disagreement as to the assessed valuation?

Mr. Carlisle: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Do you say so also, Brother Anderson? Brother Carlisle says that the assessed valuation of the personal property shows a wide disagreement as to the figures between Virginia and West Virginia. Do you understand it?

Mr. Anderson: It is almost impossible to find out what the assesed valuation in 1863 was; for a large portion of Virginia there were no returns made because there were no assessments made.

The Special Master: My recollection is that the exhibits do show the assessed valuations for certain portions of the State. What I want to inquire about is whether the exhibits already in the case, so far as they do show assessed valuations, are agreed upon as showing what the assessed valuation was. I will simply stop right there. Do you agree on that? 846

Mr. Carlisle: We do not concede—

The Special Master: Let me give you my point. I do not know that I made myself quite plain. Suppose, for instance, for one county the returns in here show an assessed valuation of $100,000 on personal property. Now, what I want to know is do you both agree that the assessed valuation in that county is $100,000? That does not bind you, it does not affect you in any way as to what bearing it may have upon the ultimate result. Do you agree upon the figures?

Mr. McClintic: No; there is a wide disagreement all through that. There is no possibility, I think, of getting together, unless we change ideas.

The Special Master: Let me make this suggestion. Of course you are more competent to express an opinion than I am in reference to this, you being more familiar with all the facts; but it would seem to me that there ought to be a public record somewhere for the year 1863 that would give an assessed valuation and at the same time also, unless there is some confusion in connection with the inherent conditions existing at that time, there ought to be only one record on that proposition, and if so, that record ought to show one thing. Of course I don't know how this may be; I am simply giving you my impression of what I would suppose you might find. If there is a published report showing the valuation of personal property in a part of these counties for 1863, and there is only one published report, of course it will only show one thing. Do you get my point?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: You do not concede that that is the valuation by any means. It is open to any criticism that you 847 have to make.

Mr. Carlisle: The question is whether they have any correct records of that kind at all.

Mr. McClintic: We do not concede that they took them off the right books, either. In other words, we disagree as to books.

The Special Master: In other words, they claim they have made an effort to get at the original sources and you claim you have made an effort to get at the original sources, and you do not get the same results?

Mr. Carlisle: Yes. We say ours are more correct than theirs.

The Special Master: Surely; you think your results are more correct than theirs. Now, is there any probability of the experts being able to get together and agree upon what that assessed valuation is? I suppose we would all concede, at least you would concede it was admissible upon that question—what force and effect it might have would be a matter for discussion.

Mr. Anderson: As to the land, that is possible, but as to personal property it is impossible, because in a great number of counties there was no assessment at all.

The Special Master: But you do not quite get the significance of my suggestion. As to a county where there is no assessed valuation, I do not suppose either side has given any figures as to assessed valuation.

Mr. Carlisle: We have gone back to the nearest year.

The Special Master: That is another proposition. I am in- 848 quiring about 1863. My inquiries have all been directed to the year 1863. Now, what I want to know is whether the experts agree upon what the official records show in any or all of these counties, or all or none of these counties, for a valuation of personal property in 1863. That is the first question. Do they agree on the amount? And if they have not yet agreed, can they get together and agree on the amount? Or are there two sets of public records for some of these counties? If there are not two sets of public records, there is no reason why the two experts should not agree, where they go to the same record. Now, where there are no assessed valuations, of course neither side will be able to give any assessed valuation. What do you say about that proposition that the experts may be able to agree as to the assessed valuations where there are public records of the assessed valuations? What do you think about that, Brother Anderson?

Mr. Anderson: I may anticipate, probably, the putting in of our case. The suggestion of your Honor has been carefully considered by counsel on both sides and by the experts; but we found it was absolutely impossible to ascertain what the assessed valuation of the personal property was in a number of counties of Virginia.

The Special Master: Why?

Mr. Anderson: Because there was no assessment.

The Special Master: This question that I have just put does not include that proposition at all. I am afraid I did not make myself clear—

Mr. Anderson: And this fact was developed, too: That the assessments were made in different counties with reference to different standards and measures of value; that in western Virginia they had reference to United States currency, while in what now constitutes Virginia the valuations were made with reference to Confederate money. 849

The Special Master: That would be a question directed to the fair valuation rather than the assessed valuation. 850

Mr. Anderson: What is the fair estimated value? If your Honor please, to fairly meet that, to fairly respond to that inquiry directed by the Supreme Court, Virginia has taken the evidence of a number of living witnesses and has also collated and is prepared to file the evidence of concrete facts shown by the public records of the State, which demonstrate, in our judgment, what was the depreciation of property in June, 1863, approximately, as contrasted with its value in 1861. We have introduced the evidence of a number of existing, intelligent witnesses, business men, men of wide experience, who testify as to those facts as to the State at large, and as to particular instances; and we have introduced the testimony of the records as to sale after sale of property made at that time, and as to the partition of property and the value put upon it by experienced business men, showing the enormous depreciation of real estate at that time and the enormous depreciation of personal property, and showing that as a minimum the loss was not less than fifty per cent., while in a large part of the State the personal property loss was ninety per cent., it was found that nine-tenths had been destroyed; in other sections three-fourths, and so on. But we have taken one-half, if your Honor please, and we have divided 1861, the value for those years by two, and we think that is a very liberal estimate as to West Virginia. That is as near as we can get to a fair estimate of the value of the property.

The Special Master: Now, let us get down to the question pending before me. If I understand you, you yourself in the last analysis predicate some of your figures on the assessed valuation of personal property. 851

Mr. Anderson: The assessed valuation before the war.

The Special Master: It does not make any difference when it was.

You cannot do that unless it is a legal element in reaching the conclusion. Otherwise you would have to exclude it. Now, if it is a legal element in 1861, it is a legal element in 1863?

Mr. Conrad: Oh, no—

The Special Master: One moment. I do not appreciate the distinction between one year and another year. I do not say it concludes. I cannot quite see why an assessment in one year is a valid element in reaching a conclusion and an assessment in another year is not a valid element in reaching a conclusion. The force or weight it may have is another thing. If counsel will notice the distinction I make there they will see the point. The one thing I am interested in here is to have such evidence put in as has a legitimate bearing on establishing this issue, and I could not let Virginia set up one contention predicated upon the assessed valuation of personal property at one time and consider that and then exclude all consideration of the assessed valuation of property at another period. The only point is this: Is assessed valuation at any time an element entitled to be considered? The weight to be given to it, of course, is a matter to be determined later. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir. 852

The Special Master: Now, what I want to know is whether the assessed valuations—I will go back to those other years after I get through with 1863. I am talking about 1863, and I am more than glad to have counsel make their suggestions as I go along. Now, the question we are on right now is whether or not the experts and the parties agreed upon what the assessed valuation of the personal property was, so far as you have been able to get it, in 1863. That does not bind either of you as to the effect to be given to that valuation. I simply want to know whether you agree upon the figures, and I will hear you later as to whether or not it is entitled to some weight or great weight.

Mr. Conrad: Speaking for the creditors, as far as any official assessment or appraisement of personal property is concerned, that can be produced by West Virginia, I would be prepared to accept it.

Mr. Carlisle: You have an assessed value on personal property in 1863, assessed by old Virginia and divided by four.

Mr. Conrad: That is very easily made. Will your Honor pardon me a moment?

The Special Master: Certainly.

Mr. Conrad: When you employed a while ago as the rule of reasoning the instance, in reference to Virginia, that a certain assessment of 1861 or 1860 or 1859 might be assumed as a reasonable basis to reason from, that therefore the sum given would be true in 1863, I venture, with great deference, to suggest to your Honor that there is a serious fallacy in that reasoning. 853

The Special Master: If I conveyed that reasoning to you, Brother Conrad, it was not intentional. My suggestion on that only went this distance. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. It was bearing upon the question as to whether the assessment of the personal property was an element to be considered, any assessment made at any time being open to any explanation that may be made.

Mr. Conrad: I think that will be conceded.

The Special Master: The only question is whether the assessment, whenever it was made, so far as it is entitled to weight, is a factor to be considered.

Mr. Conrad: I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. Littlefield: That is all I meant to convey. I did not intend by any means to intimate that an assessment made in 1863 was entitled to the same weight and had the same probative force as the assessment made in 1861. I will hear you upon that question, when we come to it. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. Conrad: Yes, sir.

Mr. Carlisle: We all agree to that.

The Special Master: Now, we will start where I began. Do you both agree upon the assessment of personal property so far as it is taken from the official records for the year 1863, as to the amount?

Mr. Carlisle: We would agree, I have no doubt—

Mr. McClintic: I beg your pardon—

Mr. Carlisle: One moment. We could agree as to the actual assessment of personal property in 1863. But they do not put it into their report, they do not put it in their report or account, except where they divided it by four, and we cannot take that division. 854

The Special Master: I do not ask you to. You agree, in the first place, in the figures?

Mr. Anderson: We have filed an exhibit giving the assessment of 1863.

The Special Master: Do you both agree—

Mr. McClintic: If they have filed an assessment of counties I have never seen it. They have filed a number five, which gives the total, but if they have filed it by counties I have never seen it. Now, we did file a statement by counties, of Virginia, I suppose about 75 per cent. of the counties, from the property books of 1863, which is our Exhibit E-1.

Mr. Conrad: When you refer to Virginia, what do you mean?

Mr. McClintic: I mean the present State of Virginia.

Mr. Conrad: How may counties?

Mr. McClintic: I would suppose seventy-five per cent. of the counties. I did not calculate them exactly. They show on this Exhibit 5, or E-1, filed by us.

Mr. Conrad: From official assessment?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Right there, I would like to know what difficulty there is in Mr. Potter, representing Virginia, looking those figures over and either agreeing or disagreeing to them.

Mr. McClintic: I see no objection to that. 855

The Special Master: Then why do you spend time discussing that?

Mr. McClintic: That was a question of fact I wanted to put before your Honor.

The Special Master: Precisely. Without remembering in which schedule it was, I had a recollection that there was segregated a schedule by counties. Now, I would like to inquire from you, General Anderson, whether or not Mr. Potter cannot look over these official records for 1863 and advise the Master and all concerned whether he agrees with the statement of figures given by the expert for West Virginia as the personal valuations for 1863.

Mr. Carlisle: As to those counties?

The Special Master: Certainly.

Mr. Anderson: I think that can be done, but I do not see how that can be informing to the Master in ascertaining the fair estimated value, for the reason that in Virginia the standard was Confederate money and in West Virginia the standard was greenbacks.

The Special Master: There is no use in discussing that question now, because I am not hearing that question now. I will hear you both on that ad libitum before we get through with the hearing and all the evidence you have on that, but what I am trying to get at now is whether one piece of evidence which you both undertake to submit, and one relies on for one purpose and the other for another purpose, whether you both agree on that.

Mr. Anderson: That is just a question of time, and it will 856 not take very much time I think.

The Special Master: Then, we will have probably from both experts a joint schedule stating what the official valuation for such of the counties as you have been able to get the valuation of personal property for for 1863. Now, do you both agree—you understand what I am trying to get? You submit, Brother Anderson, some official valuations of 1861, do you not?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Now, do you both agree as to the figures submitted by Virginia as the official valuations for those various counties, as to personal property, for the year 1861? Do you both agree about that?

Mr. Conley: No, sir, we do not agree to that because they do not include the whole property, as we contend.

The Special Master: I will say this. Unless it is put down by counties the Master will not consider it. Let us see what this paragraph calls for (reading from the decree): "And also on the basis of the fair estimated valuation of property, real and personal, by counties, of the State of Virginia." Now, I have to say to you that as I shall require both Virginia and West Virginia to submit to me their valuations by counties, I shall not consider a lump valuation; I cannot report it that way; I have got to report it by counties, and you must submit it to me by counties.

Mr. Anderson: We will furnish that in detail. We have it in the aggregate.

The Special Master: Then separate it into counties. I 857 mean report by counties, for I cannot report total valuations.

Mr. Anderson: We take our figures from the Auditor's report.

The Special Master: It is immaterial where you take them from, but you must get your facts in here so as to answer the questions propounded. Now, Virginia must submit—I say must submit; I mean that of course in a tentative way—in order to have considered their contention by the Master they must submit a valuation by counties. I suppose you can do that without trouble, can you not, Mr. Potter?

Mr. Potter: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: And is there any good reason why the official records for 1861 do not show one thing? Do I understand there is any difficulty about the official records of 1861, so far as you find them?

Mr. McClintic: I don't know, your Honor. We simply went into the books where we could find them.

The Special Master: Let me ask Mr. Dixey this question. Is there any difficulty in agreeing that the books show one thing as to the assessed valuation of personal property for 1861?

Mr. Dixey: For all the counties? Yes, sir.

The Special Master: So far as they exist?

Mr. Dixey: Not so far as they exist.

The Special Master: There is no difficulty about that?

Mr. Dixey: No, sir. 858

Mr. Anderson: A few counties would have to be taken for 1860. There is very little difference.

The Special Master: These suggestions apply to 1860 or 1861. Whether 1860 or 1861 is too remote in the consideration that will be open to both of you to discuss. You do not bind yourself to anything; but I am trying to eliminate everything I can that you can agree on. I do not want to have to take all these figures, and then try to find out what the valuation is by counties. I don't want to have to go through all that myself in order to get at the result. If you can agree upon that, it will save us all a great deal of time.

Mr. Dixey: Do you want all the counties obtainable for 1863, and also all the counties obtainable for 1861, even though they be duplicates?

The Special Master: Duplicates?

Mr. Dixey: I mean even though the counties appear in 1861 and 1863 both; do you want them for both years?

The Special Master: That is a matter upon which you may be guided by the advice of your counsel. What I want is this. If Virginia submits these figures for 1860 and 1861 and 1863, I would like to have the expert for West Virginia examine those figures and compare them and tell me whether he agrees that they are correct statements from the official records. Do I make myself plain?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir.

Mr. McClintic: I understand, but I want to say this for the benefit of the other gentlemen. We are supposed to submit here at this hearing the personal assessment of 1860 as taken from the Auditor's reports, and if the gentlemen want to take it 859 and go over it with the books, I would be glad to do that; but at the same time we are going to submit that as testimony for whatever it is worth.

Mr. Conrad: From the report of Auditor Bennett?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

Mr. Conrad: His published report is here.

Mr. McClintic: I am taking it off. In addition to that, I want to submit a table showing the value of real and personal property by counties in 1860 and published in a book called Miscellaneous statistics, Census Reports, 1860.

The Special Master: That is, a United States Census report?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir. I have taken a transcript from it for convenience; and if the gentlemen want to take that and compare it with the books, I would be glad to have them do so:

Mr. Anderson: Will you let us have a copy of that?

The Special Master: Yes; let them have a copy of it. Counsel need not have any apprehension. There is no agreement that you make here that will in the slightest degree at all prejudice your rights as to whether this thing or that thing shall be given this effect or that effect. I am simply trying to get an agreement upon the elements, and what weight I will give these things is something I will hear you on later. But get your facts all in now. That is, I would suggest that that is the best thing to do. And then later, when we come to have the final argument, I will hear you both upon what is proper and what weight should be given to this consideration or that consideration. But now we will get all the facts we can agree upon, and that will simply eliminate some elements of controversy. 860

Mr. McClintic: I will also at the proper time present a table showing the number of slaves, as taken from the United States Census report; likewise the number under twelve years old and the number over twelve years old; and the total by counties; also the slaves assessed in 1860 in each of the counties, over twelve years old, as shown by the auditor's report.

The Special Master: That is, bearing upon the question of valuation of personal property?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir. I will give notice to the other side.

The Special Master: You submit that as notice of something you intend to offer, and it is subject to inspection and criticism by the other side?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Now, when can Mr. Potter and Mr. Dixey give us this record by counties of the assessed valuation of the personal property for 1863, 1861 and 1860?

Mr. Anderson: That data has been compiled by both sides.

The Special Master: I mean when can they give us that result, so I can put it in the record that that is what the figures show?

Mr. Carlisle: For the counties which they can have access to.

The Special Master: The agreement covers the counties for which figures can be had. 861

Mr. Anderson: Take the first year, 1860.

The Special Master: The records will all show that.

Mr. McClintic: Did I correctly understand your Honor to say that if you cannot get 1863, you would like to have the nearest year?

The Special Master: No; I am not intimating that I am going to take anything—

Mr. McClintic: I mean are you asking for that?

The Special Master: No. I understand this: That you have in here already, either on the part of Virginia or on the part of West Virginia, the valuation of the personal property for 1863 so far as it goes, and you also have in here the valuation for 1861—

Mr. McClintic: 1862—

The Special Master: Well, that is very good. You may put in—and so far as you put in I should like to have you agree upon what that valuation shows. Now, the weight to be given that is to be determined later, after having heard the argument of both parties. If you want to put in your valuation for 1863, so far as you have got it and agree on it, and if you want to put the figures in for 1862 and 1861 and 1860 the same, that simply covers this. You agree on the amounts, but you do not agree on the effect of it, and I do not intimate what weight I will give to any of the valuations. Do I make that clear, Brother Anderson?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir. 862

The Special Master: Is that satisfactory, Brother Conrad?

Mr. Conrad: Entirely so.

The Special Master: The only purpose now being to get away brushwood, is to get to the agreement on the facts. The effect to be given to it is a matter for later consideration. Can the experts give us that, and, if so, when will they be able to give it to us?

Mr. McClintic: Well, we have it for 1863, already, taken from the books.

The Special Master: Have you got it for all three years, or all four years?

Mr. McClintic: No. We have 1860 only from the Auditor's report; and 1861 and 1862—and only where we could get it for 1863.

The Special Master: This only requires you to agree so far as you can agree. If, in addition to the agreement, you think there is anything in relation to either of those years you want to introduce—

Mr. McClintic: The trouble about it is it involves a great deal of labor, going down to the basement of this building and getting out a lot of boxes filled with books and going all over them.

Mr. Conrad: At the first meeting there was offered on the part of Virginia a report made by Mr. Bennett, the Auditor of Virginia, giving an itemized, detailed statement of each county of the State, of the appraisement of every article of personal property in the commonwealth. That has been in evidence all the time, made county by county, alphabetically arranged, giving the 863 assessment of the personal property up to 1862. Now, when gentlemen say that they have, from the official records of Virginia an assessment of personal property in 1863, I confess that is a matter of astonishment to me.

Mr. Carlisle: We say part of it.

Mr. McClintic. It has been introduced in evidence here, and a copy of it furnished you.

Mr. Conrad: There was hardly, outside of the cities and towns of this commonwealth, a tea cup equipped with a handle in 1863.

Mr. McClintic: Oh, you had a heap more property than you thought you had.

Mr. Conrad: No, sir, we had not, and I know pretty well what I am talking about. We hadn't any farming implements to speak of—

The Special Master: I have just read Mrs. Pryor's book on that period. While I do not want to be understood that I have taken judicial notice, sitting here as Master, of what is stated in that book, still it is very illuminating. I do not say it is controlling by any means.

Mr. Conrad: It is so conspicuous that the Courts of Virginia would take judicial notice of the fact—I am referring to how little personal property there was here—and the personal property of the State consisted in great part of slaves and bank stock.

Mr. Carlisle: But still, if they did make an assessment—

The Special Master: I can say this. Of course I notice the 864 Major's suggestion about this book. I suppose if the other side offers evidence that they think impeaches it, I shall be obliged to admit, if in my judgment it is competent. When we come to what is evidence, I suppose both sides expect me to rule, or endeavor to rule, in accordance with legal principles bearing upon the question of that ancient debt. I suppose if West Virginia claims that there is an official record upon which this report must have been based, and they say it does not agree with it, I do not see why I would not have to be required to consider it in determining whether or not I thought that, as distinguished from the book, was the authentic valuation. Now, those are all questions that are going to come up later. My question now is, will the experts go back to the original official records for the year 1863, 1861, 1862 and 1860, and so far as they show, in whole or in part, the valuation of the personal property, will they agree on it if they can? Then, when we come to the valuation of 1861, if either side has any contention they want to submit in reference thereto, tending to show that it is not entitled to the weight it would show on its face, I will hear it. And the same with 1860, 1862 and 1863. I do not say, and I do not understand, that the assessed valuation of personal property is the only criterion of its fair value. Of course I could not rule that; not in the presence of lawyers; but I suppose we are all quite familiar with the kind of evidence that it would be necessary to have in order to establish the valuation of property at any period of time. By those rules I should expect counsel to be governed, and of course I will have to do the best I can in ruling, to follow 865 along on those rules. Now, all we are trying to do is to get at one element, without any reference whatever to the weight it has, subject to all kinds of explanations that either of you can make, to get that one element agreed upon for the year 1860, 1861, 1862 and 1863, so far as you can get the original sources. There ought not to be any trouble about that.

Mr. Anderson: I do not think there ought to be any trouble about that. It will only take a little time.

The Special Master: Does that embarrass you, Brother Anderson?

Mr. Anderson: No, sir.

The Special Master: With the suggestion I have made, does that embarrass you, Brother Conrad?

Mr. Conrad: No, sir.

The Special Master: That is, as far as that goes. Now, are there any other items in relation to paragraph 5, as to which you have any disagreement, or as to which there have been disagreements, as to which you can now agree? If not, we will go to paragraph 6.

Mr. Anderson: I do not think there are, sir. What will be a fair estimated value on each side will rely on different evidence.

The Special Master: Now, of course, whether you will want to put your evidence in until you get the assessed valuation to work from—

Mr. Anderson: I think it will be better to put it all to- 866 gether.

The Special Master: I do not know but what you both might want to use the assessed valuation to start from, and of course if you do, we will have to wait until you get that.

[Vol. 7. July 1, 1909.]

[The Special Master]: 876

We next come to Plaintiff's Exhibit, Substitute Exhibit E-1.

Mr. Anderson: That will await the filing of the assessed valuations.

The Special Master: We cannot go on intelligently until 877 you agree as to those results, so far as that is concerned.

[Vol. 7. July 1, 1909. As to assessed values.]

Mr. Carlisle: * * * We still have the matter of the assessment—

Mr. Conrad: The assessments of 1863?

Mr. Carlisle: No, sir; the assessment of 1863 so far as there is any assessment in 1863 is already in. Now, what the Master wants is an assessment by counties. 908

Mr. Conrad: We put it in.

Mr. McClintic: I haven't seen it.

Mr. Conrad: We submitted that.

Mr. McClintic: You mean the book you filed?

Mr. Conrad: Yes.

Mr. McClintic: Not for 1860. There were only partial figures for 1861 in that book.

Mr. Conrad: Pardon me. I am perfectly familiar with that book. That is a report made by Mr. Bennett, a reliable West Virginian, who was the Auditor of this State. He made it when he represented the territory of both the present States, and we put that in evidence formally and distinctively a year ago. There is an assessment by counties of all personal property. The gentlemen say they have not seen it.

Mr. Carlisle: I never saw it, I am sure.

Mr. Conrad: It has been in evidence all the time.

Mr. McClintic: Did you put in that as your claim of the assessment under this exhibit you filed as No. 5? 909

The Special Master: Just one moment. I doubt whether this is making much progress. Let me make this suggestion without discussing the character of this book or what it is evidentiary of, we have two sets of accountants here, and I am rather inclined to think it is the proper thing for each accountant to submit a schedule of his own. I think it is quite fair, Brother Conrad, for them to ask your accountant to submit his schedule. Then he can show the source from which he got it, and then they can get together and agree, perhaps. There may be evidence in this case, and it may be legal evidence; and I do not say you will be required to put in anything additional, but it seems to me it is quite proper for them to ask your expert to take up the evidence submitted by their experts, by counties, and see if they can agree. We cannot print all this book.

Mr. Conrad: It would not be necessary. It is a public official document.

The Special Master: Somebody must pick it out from the book, and it strikes me that your expert is the best man to do it. I do not think they are unreasonable in requesting that they try to get together with their expert, on these counties in these years. I may agree with you that you may have the evidence already in.

Mr. Conrad: All that would be necessary would be one to hold the book and the other hold his statement and go over it.

The Special Master: That is simply giving the result. That does not militate against the fact that the result ought to be reached. You may be right about that. I do not under- 910 take to say about that. Then, Mr. Carlisle's suggestion is that the introduction of evidence on the part of Virginia in connection with what the assessed value of real property was at that time is contingent upon the submitting of these schedules by the accountants, and that then that evidence will come in. I understood that to be Mr. Anderson's position. Am I right.

Mr. Anderson: I would like to say a word on the entire question.

The Special Master. Certainly.

Mr. Anderson: I cherish a most earnest desire to expedite this case, and I see no occasion whatever for any such delay as is now proposed.

Mr. McClintic: We are not proposing any delay.

Mr. Anderson: Excuse me. I have been waiting for an opportunity to say this, and I will not take very much time to say what I want to say.

The Special Master: You will have unlimited time. I mean, I want you to take all the time you desire.

Mr. Anderson: I see no occasion for this delay at all. This matter of the assessed value in 1863 of the real and personal property can be put before you to-morrow, or certainly by Saturday, official records, as to the items of which there can be no controversy whatever. The statements which Virginia desires to file under section 5 of the decree, which I believe is E-1 of the Exhibits, can all be laid before your Honor either now or on Saturday morning, or to-morrow. So there is no occasion for delay so far as Exhibit E is concerned.

[Vol. 7. July 1, 1909. Relating to Joint Statement of Assessed Values.]

The Special Master: I think we have gotten pretty nearly through everything we can do except Paragraph 5, and the evidence you may want to submit.

Mr. Conrad: The experts will get together, I understand, under your direction, on the matter of reconcilement of the matters of appraisement.

The Special Master: I do not want you to feel concerned by any suggestion I make, but my suggestion is, would it be practical for you to go right along under this paragraph and then put in your proof under Paragraph 5, and then let the schedules come in later? If you do not feel if would be best to go on now, we can take it up in the morning. Of course if we could do it now in the course of an hour or so—

935

Mr. Anderson: We would not be ready on No. 5.

The Special Master: Is not everything you have got on that in depositions?

Mr. Anderson: No. We want to file something as to the assessed values.

The Special Master: You could not go with that now?

Mr. Anderson: No, sir. It will take a very little time for an accountant—

The Special Master: We could not get through with that this evening?

Mr. Anderson: No. I think probably Schedule E-1 will take an hour.

The Special Master: The question is, will we not save time if we postpone that until to-morrow? We cannot close it up this afternoon, as far as I can see.

Mr. Moon: Your Honor asked for a joint schedule under Paragraph 1?

The Special Master: That we have already agreed to.

Mr. Moon: They are getting that up. 936

The Special Master: They are to take that and make one schedule and both sign it, so we will not have two duplicates on file. That takes care of that. What do you think, gentlemen, that we would make as much progress as practicable if we were to adjourn now until to-morrow morning?

(Informal discussion followed as to the question of adjustment.)

Mr. Conrad: I understand also that when we adjourn here we adjourn for the final argument of the case.

Mr. Carlisle: If the experts do not get through to-morrow, whenever they do get through, let them send us the result of their work.

The Special Master: You will be ready to-morrow morning at nine o'clock, will you not, gentlemen?

Mr. Dixcy. I think so. We may not have that Exhibit A.

The Special Master: All the experts have got to reconcile under Paragraph 5 is the assessed valuation by counties for the years 1863, 1862, 1861, and 1860, so far as they can get them. There is no reason why you will not be ready, is there?

Mr. Dixcy: Only the physical reason that these books are incased in packing boxes, and they have to be dug out, and there is a good deal of labor involved, and it will take a good deal of time.

The Special Master: You appreciate this. Here are eight or ten lawyers. Their time is all worth something, and they are anxious to get through with his. We do not want to unduly press you people, but if you can be here to-morrow morning at nine 937 o'clock with a reconcilement of these matters that have been submitted to you, it will clean this case up, and it will be really an extremely great convenience to all concerned. Now, we feel like asking under these circumstances that you shall put in all the time possible between now and then to get the results. You appreciate the situation?

Mr. Anderson: If Mr. Dixcy and Mr. Potter cannot agree, I would be very glad if your Honor would indicate to them that they state in writing wherein they do not agree.

The Special Master: Yes; I will do that.

Mr. Carlisle: And if they do not agree, they may agree later.

The Special Master: It is almost sure that they can agree on what the official record shows.

Mr. Carlisle: Suppose they do not agree by to-morrow morning.

The Special Master: They can have one set of men at work on that branch of the case and another set under the other paragraph all at the same time, and it really does seem to me, even though they may have to work pretty late, that they really ought to put in some extra exertion in order to be here and facilitate this whole matter on the part of all concerned, because it will be a great accommodation to all of us.

[Vol. 7. July 2, 1909. Testimony of J. M. McWhorter.]

Mr. McClintic: I have a witness I would like to put on the stand.

The Special Master: Very well; while we are waiting for Mr. Potter, Mr. McClintic suggests that we hear from his witness.

Whereupon

J. M. McWHORTER

a witness produced by and on behalf of the State of West Virginia, having been first duly sworn, was examined.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. What is your age?

A. Well, I have lived 81 years; I don't know whether I am that old or not.

Q. What is your occupation?

A. Attorney at law.

Q. What official positions did you hold under the Government of Virginia before the 20th of June, 1863, if any?

A. I was clerk of the County Court and deputy clerk of the 944
Circuit Court of Roane County.

Q. What official positions have you held under the Government of West Virginia?

A. I was first Warden of the Penitentiary for one year—not for a year, either. I was appointed to see whether we could work the convicts to any advantage, and they were scattered through the different jails, and I informed the Governor, after investigating, that we could not work them to any advantage.

Q. What other position did you hold?

A. Then I was Auditor for two terms.

Q. When did you first become Auditor of West Virginia?

A. In 1865.

Q. Were you elected in 1864?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you ever a member of the West Virginia Legislature?

A. I was.

Q. When?

A. In 1863, the first Legislature of the State.

Q. What other positions have you held, besides being Auditor of the State?

A. Judge of the Circuit Court of the Circuit of Greenbrier County, and associate counties with Greenbrier.

Q. How often were you judge of that Circuit Court?

A. Twice.

Q. When did your last term end?

A. December 31, 1904.

Q. When were you first judge of that Circuit?

A. I was appointed Judge there in March, 1870. 945

Q. How long did you serve then?

A. Nearly three years.

Q. You served until you were constituted out of office by a new Constitution?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you over in West Virginia much during the periods of 1861, 1862 and 1863?

A. The War broke out in 1861. I was clerk of the county court of Roane county, and lived there until February, 1864. I then moved to Jackson County. I was over in Jackson, and Kanawha during that time; and some other counties, also, for instance, Mason—

Q. What was the condition of that country as to the contending armies? Was there much raiding and backward and forward movements of each army through that section of West Virginia?

A. Yes, sir. In 1861, when the War broke out, the people divided, those belonging to the Union Forces, those adhering to the Union, forming what they called home guards. On the other side, they had guerilla companies; and between the two it was a terrible state of affairs. I do not want to see it again, and I don't think I ever will.

Q. What was the result of that guerilla warfare upon the people and the property and personal property, especially?

A. No one could feel any safety as to his property. I lost a horse or two myself. Most everybody had to keep a constant watch on his property for fear it would be carried away by one side or the other. 946

Q. What was the condition of property in West Virginia as to depreciation in value on account of these war conditions?

A. As I remember it now, property was very much depreciated in value, because of the apprehension all the time that they would lose it. They found a ready market for the cattle, beef cattle and sheep, mutton; that found a ready market as long as the soldiers were in there. But there was a constant fear and apprehension all the time of the loss of property, and people were ready to dispose of it at a depreciated price.

The Special Master: Am I correct in understanding you to say that it resulted in an absolute depreciation, or simply that there was this apprehension?

The Witness: On account of the apprehension, there was a depreciation. People were ready to dispose of their property and turn it into money.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Was or was there not a large emigration from West Virginia from the period of 1861 to 1863?

A. There was in 1861. As I have stated, the companies were formed on one side and the other. Nearly all that went into the home guard, men of proper age, went into the Federal forces, in the Federal Army; and they moved their families out, so as to have them secure.

Q. Was there not a large emigration from West of the Confederate sympathizers, down into Virginia or other Southern States?

A. Oh, yes; I know a great many who left and came south—a great many. 947

Q. Was there not also a large emigration of Union sympathizers to Ohio and other nearby Northern States?

A. Yes, sir; a large emigration.

Q. Were there many army movements, either of the Confederates or of the Federals, backwards and forwards in West Virginia during this period, and continuous raids by one side or the other?

A. The Confederates first organized companies there—

The Special Master: I think he has already stated that. I understood him to testify in regard to that.

Mr. McClintic: I am not speaking of the Guerilla companies, but the Confederate Army proper now.

The Special Master: Very well; proceed.

A. The Confederates first organized their forces there; but they did not hold their position very long. They soon had to leave. They left there and there never were any other forces than the guerilla forces on either side, except in—I have forgotten now whether it was 1861 or 1862, but whenever it was, there was one other raid through there, by General Jones. He passed through, and the forces of the regular army, a small army, got out of the way then.

Q. What was in the minds of the people as to confiscation of property at that time; what was discussed?

Mr. Harrison: You are not asking for facts now, but what was in the minds of the people?

Mr. McClintic: Yes; what was in the minds of the people.

A. Well, it was understood there at one time that there was 948 a bill pending before the Confederate Congress to confiscate the property of the Union men of the State, and it alarmed them a good deal.

Q. Was there not also talk and claims made by the Union people that they would confiscate the property of the Confederates?

A. There was a great deal of that done; a great deal of talk that it was a part of warfare to confiscate the opponent's property.

Q. Was there not in effect a good deal of that done? I mean, was there not a good deal of real confiscation?

A. That is what I say; there was a good deal of that done, a good deal of property confiscated.

Mr. Conrad: Confiscated?

Mr. McClintic: Yes; taken in all sorts of ways.

Mr. Conrad: That is not confiscation.

Mr. McClintic: It amounted to the same thing.

Mr. Conrad: Oh, no!

The Special Master: What you are trying to show is that one or the other of the contending forces took personal property and applied it to their own purposes?

Mr. McClintic: Not only personal property, but real property, through alleged forms of law.

The Special Master: If that is true, I suppose it could be shown by legal proceedings.

The Witness: I do not know that any real property was taken.

The Special Master: You would not undertake to establish that, by oral testimony? 949

The Witness: I do not think any real property was taken.

The Special Master: Of course, whatever was done under the forms of law, the records will show. Personal property, of course, could be taken physically without having any written proceedings connected therewith.

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. When you speak of the conditions there, are you speaking of the single county of Greenbrier, or of that section of the State?

A. I was speaking of the section in which I lived. I am not speaking of Greenbrier.

Q. You are not confining yourself to Greenbrier?

A. I was not in Greenbrier. I was in Roane County and Kanawha and Mason County.

Mr. McClintic: And adjoining territory?

The Witness: Yes.

The Special Master: The whole territory with which you were conversant at that time. That is what he is testifying about?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir. That is all.

Cross Examination.

By Mr. Conrad:

Q. Referring to the numerous offices that you have held, were any of them held under the old State of Virginia?

A. Yes, sir; up to the time of the convention at Wheeling, when they declared themselves independent of Virginia.

Q. What office had you held up to that time? 950

A. I had held the office of clerk of the county court.

Q. But your judgeship and your position as Warden of the penitentiary, and so forth, was under the restored government of Virginia?

A. No, sir; it was under the Government of West Virginia.

Q. You lived in Roane County, and then moved to Jackson, an adjoining county?

A. Yes, sir. That was in 1864 that I moved to Jackson County.

Q. When you speak, or have spoken of the condition of affairs in West Virginia, do you undertake to state under oath here anything about the condition of affairs outside of Roane and Jackson and the adjoining counties?

A. No, sir; I do not. I did go, though, sometimes, into Lewis County, and sometimes into Harrison County.

Q. You have been asked about the destruction of property there. Can you say that to your knowledge any property ever was destroyed by any organized force of the Confederate Army?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What property?

A. Yes.

Q. When and what property?

A. I was just saying that I am not quite sure when it was that Colonel Jones passed through there. I think it may have been in 1861— 951

Q. 1862.

Mr. Carlisle: 1863, was it not?

The Witness: 1863, I believe it was.

By Mr. Conrad:

Q. I was adjutant of one of his regiments.

The Special Master: This was not Judge Jones, of Alabama?

Mr. Conrad: No, this was another Jones; William E. Jones.

The Special Master: There are several Joneses.

By Mr. Conrad:

Q. Just a moment. This is a matter I wish to have stated particularly. I wish you would indicate one piece of property that you know, to your knowledge, was destroyed by any Confederate force?

A. I don't know that I can, any personal property.

Q. What real property was destroyed?

A. None that I know of.

Q. Oh, yes, there was. We burned up hundreds of thousands of barrels of oil.

A. I was not in the oil section. I remember of hearing of that.

Q. I want you to state to the Master whether you know of that command taking any horses or cattle or property of that kind that was not paid for, and paid for in greenbacks, at that?

A. Yes. I did.

Q. What was it?

A. That was old Man Hickle, in Roane County. He came 952 in there, and old man Jenkins offered him greenbacks for what they took from him and he would not take the greenbacks, but wanted Confederate money.

Mr. Conrad: I hope your Honor got that point.

By Mr. Conrad:

Q. I wish you would state again if you know of any property whatever that was taken by General Jones' command?

A. I do not.

Q. Do you know of any other organized Confederate force that ever was in that part of Virginia during the War?

A. I know some forces that claimed to be organized and claimed to be a part of the Confederate Army.

Q. What counties were they in?

A. They were in Calhoun, Roane, Jackson—they were scouting parties, rangers, they called themselves.

Q. Guerillas?

A. Well, they called themselves rangers.

Q. Yes. Let us see a moment. Were not those men composing those commands, citizens of that part of the country?

A. Some of them were and some were not.

Q. Do you know any of them that were not?

A. Most of them were composed of the citizens.

Q. Again, I ask you, to your knowledge was there any organized part of the military force of the Confederate Army in that part of Virginia?

A. Not unless these companies that I have referred to could be considered a part of the military force of the Confederate 953 Army.

Q. Those guerillas, you mean. They were not. Now, when you talk about property being destroyed and taken, you mean taken by those guerillas?

A. I do, mostly.

Q. They were your own people—

Mr. Carlisle: It wouldn't make any difference who took it. The question is whether it was taken.

Mr. Conrad: I understand that.

The Special Master: I suppose I should have to say that if the statements made by Major Conrad are evidence, he would subject himself to cross examination.

Mr. Conrad: I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. Carlisle: It makes no difference whatever, if the property was destroyed, who destroyed it.

The Special Master: The cross examination is proceeding, evidently, from a more or less intimate knowledge of conditions inquired about.

Mr. Conrad: Yes; I ought to know something about them.

The Special Master: Not that the Master indicates that he thinks counsel confiscated any of the property—

Mr. McClintic: I believe the distinguished counsel admits that he burned bridges.

Mr. Conrad: When General Lee entered Pennsylvania he issued an order absolutely prohibiting his men from even taking an apple from the orchards, and there is no evidence that the rule was ever violated. And so, when we went into West Virginia, property 954 was not taken by the soldiers, and if you know of any instance in which Jones' command took property without paying for it, I wish you would state it.

The Special Master: He has stated that already.

The Witness: I said I do not know of his taking any, and I did not hear of his taking any.

Mr. Conrad: Then he says his knowledge of West Virginia is confined to these counties.

The Special Master: Yes; I so understand it.

Mr. Conley's suggestion in regard to the apples was that General Lee probably knew what the effect would be on the men if they eat green apples.

Mr. Conrad: It was a bellicose thing, then, you know.

The Special Master: He was a little afraid it might be disastrous.

By Mr. Anderson:

Q. When were you auditor of West Virginia?

A. My term of office commenced March 4, 1865.

Q. I have here the auditor's report from 1861 to 1870, of West Virginia, a book which has already been offered in evidence.

Mr. McClintic: Understand me; I never introduced the book in evidence. I only introduced one page. You can introduce as much as you want to, however.

Mr. Anderson: It is understood that either party can refer to this.

The Special Master: Certainly; that is right.

By Mr. Anderson:

Q. I notice in the auditor's report for 1865, or coming down 955 to 1865, that the assessed valuation of personal property in Ohio County, which is the county, I believe, in which the City of Wheeling is located, aggregated $817,560 in 1860, and had increased to $2,663,637 in 1865, immediately after the war, which was an increase of over $2,100,000, an increase of over 300 per cent. If there was much destruction of personal property in West Virginia, how do you account for that condition of affairs, that the property increased threefold during that time?

A. Well, in Ohio County it was entirely safe. They had never been raided. They had not been threatened with danger there, and the City of Wheeling did prosper beyond any question.

The Special Master: That is, your statement was that that county was not subject to these uncertain conditions?

The Witness: That is it, sir.

Mr. Anderson: Well, take the county of Roane. You were auditor in 1865?

The Witness: Yes, sir.

Mr. Carlisle: But this was before 1865.

Mr. Anderson: No; this is the report of 1865.

Mr. Carlisle: He was elected Auditor in 1865, was he not?

The Special Master: He was elected in 1864 and became Auditor in 1865. That was the statement of the witness.

Mr. Anderson: Yes. This shows that the assessed value of personal property in 1860 in Roane County was $158,731, and in 1861 it is estimated at $130,700, which shows a depreciation of 956
$28,000. So there appears to have been some depreciation. Let us take Ritchie County. The assessments in 1860 were $261,832; and in 1865 the figures are $445,138, or nearly double.

The Witness: In Ritchie County?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Witness: Yes, sir.

By Mr. Anderson:

Q. Take Jackson County, which is one of the counties you mentioned that suffered from the guerillas. That is immediately on the Ohio River, is it not?

A. Yes, sir; Jackson County is on the Ohio River.

Q. Your report shows that the personal property in Jackson County for 1860 was assessed at $294,986, and for 1865 you estimated it to be worth $403,314, or an increase of perhaps 60 per cent.

A. Yes, sir. It is along the Ohio River there—

Q. That is one of the counties that you say suffered. Now, take Kanawha County. Kanawha County is one of the counties mentioned. The assessed valuation of personal property in Kanawha County in 1860 was $720,969, and in 1865 that increased to $803,137, or an increase of about twenty per cent.

A. There seems to have been no loss there, no, sir.

Q. Now, Judge McWhorter, is it not a fact that no Confederate armies occupied any part of West Virginia west of Greenbrier County after 1862?

A. That is a fact, yes.

Q. Is it not true that the only Confederate armies that ever 957 were in West Virginia retired from West Virginia in the fall of 1861? That portion of West Virginia, I mean, not dominated by the Confederacy—in the fall of 1861 or early in 1862?

A. Yes, sir; excepting for these raids that I have referred to.

Q. Jones' raid?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And Jenkins' raid?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. They were commands that went rapidly into the country and rapidly out of it again?

A. That is so.

Q. They did not occupy the country but a few days, any portion of it, did they?

A. Only a short time; they just went through and out again.

Q. Was not General Lee's Army stationed on Sewell Mountain, a country that was almost a wilderness, not densely populated at all?

A. That was a mountainous region, yes, sir.

Q. And the Federal Army, under General Rosecrans, was near it in that same region, in that mountainous region, was it not?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And they had to retire from that country because of the bad conditions of the roads, and because it was impossible to supply their armies; is not that so?

A. That was the situation, yes, sir. 958

Q. When was oil first discovered in West Virginia? When was petroleum, I mean, first discovered?

A. I think it was in 1860.

Q. Was not that industry and that resource of West Virginia largely developed during the War, in the early part of the Civil War?

A. Well, in 1861, it was the most active development that we had, I believe.

Q. When was natural gas discovered in West Virginia?

A. There has been the greatest discovery of natural gas in recent years.

Q. Was it not discovered during the Civil War?

A. It has not grown into use then, I am sure.

Q. It had not been developed for economic purposes?

A. No, sir.

Q. But it was discovered?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And the petroleum interest was largely developed, was it not?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. In considerable sections of the State?
A. Yes, sir.

The Special Master: In 1861 it was the highest state of development, I understand.

Mr. Anderson: In 1861, 1862 and 1863. The development was along the Little Kanawha River and other regions of the State.

Mr. McClintic: There were not any developments of oil except along the Kanawha River.

Mr. Anderson: Are you testifying? 959

Mr. McClintic: You are testifying. You are asserting that the development was along the Little Kanawha River and other regions of the State.

Mr. Anderson: I was asking questions.

Mr. McClintic: If you were asking a question, then it is all right.

The Special Master: If that is material, put the specific question. Is that all, Mr. Anderson?

Mr. Anderson: No, sir.

The Witness: During the war, after 1861, I do not think there was much development of the oil, or much working of the oil there.

By Mr. Anderson:

Q. Was there not a market in West Virginia in 1862 and 1863 for all the products of agriculture, and other products of the people?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. They got good prices?
A. Yes, sir; pretty good prices.
Q. In lawful money of the United States?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did not the United States Government, in connection with its military operations, expend very large sums of money in West Virginia?

The Special Master: In the purchase of supplies, you mean?

Mr. Anderson: In the purchase of supplies, yes.

A. They got good prices for all their products.

By Mr. Anderson: 960

Q. Did not Cincinnati furnish a good market for all your products during that time, at high prices?
A. We did not have to go as far as Cincinnati.
Q. You had a home market?

A. While Uncle Sam's Army was there, we furnished to the Army all our products.

Q. And the United States Army did not depredate upon your country, did it?

A. No, sir.

Q. When they were stationed in West Virginia?

A. No, sir; I cannot say that they did. When disturbances arose, they would confiscate the property and take the property out in the region—

Q. But they paid for it, did they not?

A. They would very often do that, but if it was a Confederate they did not always pay for it.

Q. You mean if they got it from Confederate sympathizers they would not pay for it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is it not a fact that the portion of West Virginia you are familiar with, and north of that, the "Pan Handle," Monongahela and Marion and Taylor and Harrison and Ritchie Counties, and all that region there, was really prosperous during the war; did not lands appreciate in value, as well as the products of the State?

The Special Master: How can he tell when he was not up there at all. That must be hearsay. He cannot give testimony as to parts of the State he was not in, or at least we cannot give any weight to that testimony.

Mr. Anderson: He said he was in Harrison County. 960½

The Witness: Well, I was through all of these counties during the war, more or less.

The Special Master: Of course if you were through them, it is all right, you can testify about them.

Mr. Anderson: He was auditor of the State Government which was stationed at Wheeling.

The Special Master: Of course, if the record shows he was through there, where he would have an opportunity of having personal knowledge, he can testify.

The Witness: I passed through these counties—

The Special Master: But, except as to places where he has personal knowledge, there is no use to fill up the record. I cannot give any weight to a statement that is purely hearsay, you know.

Mr. Anderson: I don't want any hearsay testimony.

The Witness: The counties north of Harrison County were generally pretty prosperous.

Re-Direct Examination.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Was it not after 1863 that the counties on the Ohio River, and in the north part of the State, were safe from Confederate raids.

A. Yes, sir; from all depredations, I think. They were safe at that time.

Q. Were not all the Confederate sympathizers, and practically all of the Confederate guerillas run out of that section by that time?

A. Well, mostly. There were only occasional raids made in there. 961

Q. What proportion of the able-bodied men of your section of West Virginia went into the armies, on either side?

A. Well, Roane, Jackson and in there, I should say there were mighty near seventy-five per cent. of them in both armies.

Q. On one side or the other?

A. Yes, sir. Men between the ages of 18 and 45; I should say there was as much as seventy-five per cent. in one army or the other.

Q. Did not these counties in the northern panhandle and through that section get their so-called prosperity, which Mr. Anderson spoke of, in the last years of the war, when they were absolutely safe from intrusion, after the formation of the State of West Virginia?

A. Yes, sir; after all fears of the Confederate forces coming in there, they went right on in prosperity, I believe.

Q. Look at the table handed to you and state who made that and where you got it from?

Mr. Anderson: What table is it?

Mr. McClintic: A table made by him from certain reports.

Mr. Anderson: I have not seen a copy, have I?

Mr. McClintic: I will show it to you in a moment.

The Witness: I made this table myself.

Mr. McClintic: The following table shows the capitation returns by the Commissioners for taxation, as shown by Auditor Bennett's report in the several counties of Virginia for the year 1860, that afterward formed the State of West Virginia, and also the capitations returned by the assessors in the same counties for the year 1865, shown by auditor's report for the State of West Virginia. 962

The Special Master: This is a computation from figures already in evidence?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: You do not care to cross examine on that?

Mr. Anderson: No; I do not suppose so.

The Special Master: Well, if this does not follow the material in evidence, it is of no value, and if it is based on that report, and the reports do not sustain it, that impeaches it.

The Witness: In but two counties, as I remember, the capitations of 1865 are estimated, and that in Greenbrier County, and I believe in McDowell County.

The Special Master: Then with the exception of two counties, Greenbrier and McDowell, that is simply a computation made from a record that is already in the case, and as to Greenbrier and McDowell, you simply made an estimate; is that right?

The Witness: Yes, sir. I think it is McDowell County.

The Special Master: Greenbrier was controlled by the Confederates for a greater part of the time, was it not?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir. I will hand this to the stenographer.

The paper referred to is as follows:

Commissioners for taxation shown by Auditor Bennett's report in the several counties of Virginia for the year 1860, that afterward formed the State of West Virginia, and also the capitations returned by the Assessors in the same counties for the year 1865, shown by Auditor's report for State of West Virginia:

[Vol. 7. July 2, 1909. Certain Exhibits filed.]

Now, then, we come to 5. As to that, as I understand it, it is a physical impossibility for these accountants, by the exercise of any human diligence, to get together and get results predicated upon the original papers that they feel they ought to 998 refer to. I think it is quite proper for them to be able to go back, and to go back to the original source of information. Neither party is bound by the report of any auditor or referee. They are all entitled to the original sources of information, if they want it. Now, upon that item there is to be predicated, as I understand it, some evidence that is ready to be presented on the part of the plaintiffs, the result of which will depend upon the results reached by the auditors.

Mr. Anderson: Not entirely, sir.

The Special Master: If the auditors reach one sum, the pro- 999 portion upon which the plaintiffs rely would be one sum. If the auditors reach another sum, that same proportion of course would result in another sum. That is the only change, as I understand it, and the only effect that the advice to be submitted by the auditors could have upon the evidence to be submitted by Virginia. Suppose you claim that a certain one-half of a certain sum to be the sum allowed by me, and if the principal sum, to illustrate, was $100,000 one-half would be $50,000. If the principal sum was $50,000, one-half would be $25,000. Of course you could not have an expert state, without having first the sum upon which you would begin settled so as to go in the record; but the experts could give us the result later, and you could give us your testimony establishing the proportion, and when we print the case we can put in what the experts find in the matter, and the court will see that, and as far as I am concerned it does not make any difference, and it will not make any difference; and the court will never know but what there was introduced here the testimony of the experts giving the sum upon which you make the proportion. The only thing left, as I understand it, is the report of the auditors upon which your percentages are predicated. Am I right?

Mr. McClintic: If your Honor please, there are other things here I intended to prove by Mr. Scoville, which Mr. Dixcy is not familiar with, and knowing his illness and absence, 1000
I am at a loss to know how to proceed.

The Special Master: Let us settle this point first. How does that strike you, Mr. Attorney General?

Mr. Anderson: Part of your Honor's statement presents the position of the plaintiff, but we have other evidence on which we rely, tending to show what was the fair value of all the property in the two States.

The Special Master: What is it; have you got it in depositions?

Mr. Anderson: The depositions of a number of witnesses.

The Special Master: What harm is there is submitting it right now?

Mr. Anderson: That is what we propose to do; and besides that we propose to show a number of sales, taken from the records within the boundaries of the present State of Virginia, which have been tabulated.

The Special Master: There is no objection, then, to your submitting your evidence under this paragraph without waiting for the accounts of the accountants.

Mr. Anderson: I introduced the deposition of Robert W. Hunter and others.

The Special Master: Plaintiff introduces the depositions of Robert W. Hunter, W. W. Scott, John P. Branch, Phillip A. Wellford, William G. Taylor, S. H. Hawes, Charles U. Williams and W. Gordon McCabe, taken in the City of Richmond, State of Virginia, on the 4th of June, 1909.

Were the other side given notice?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Very well, they can go in.

(The depositions referred to were filed and marked Virginia No. 1.) and will be found at the end of the session.

The Special Master: Have you any more depositions, Mr. 1001
Attorney General?

Mr. Anderson: Yes. I will have some oral testimony in a moment. I wish now to put in a statement showing the depreciation of Confederate money as compared with gold for every month during the War, and particularly to show the depreciation of Confederate money in June, 1863.

Mr. Carlisle: Of course that is a matter upon which the Master can inform himself.

Mr. Anderson: This is a statement approved by the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia and has been adopted in thousands of transactions. It is taken from a case decided by the Supreme Court of the State.

Mr. Carlisle: Was West Virginia a party?

Mr. Anderson: No; but this settles the question.

Mr. Carlisle: Let it go for what it is worth. We don't think it is worth a very much.

The Special Master: I suppose as to this, the financial records of that time would probably bear out that statement.

Mr. Carlisle: The records of the Treasury department at Washington would show that, would show it for every day.

The Special Master: I understand that this is objected to and is admitted de bene, and I would like to have counsel for West Virginia take it and verify it, so as to be able to tell me 1002 whether the facts are correctly stated.

Mr. Carlisle: I called upon the Treasury Department for information along this same line, and expect to get it from them.

The Special Master: Is it understood by counsel for Virginia?

Mr. Carlisle: I want to say this; that I desire also to give a statement likewise, for your consideration, as to the value of the United States greenbacks in comparison with gold, at the same time.

The Special Master: Well, I suppose if I open the question as to respective values, I should probably go into a maze as to respective values of gold and greenbacks and Confederate money and gold.

Mr. Carlisle: Of course, you would, because West Virginia's money was the greenback.

The Special Master: That is a matter for me to consider. But what I want is this: Will Virginia consent that Mr. Carlisle may submit as a part of the record in the case a statement from the Treasury Department showing, during the period covered by your statement, the value of gold and greenbacks?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

Mr. Conrad: In Virginia.

Mr. Carlisle: And in West Virginia.

The Special Master: Now, this statement here, this only goes so far as to allow the defendants to submit as a part of the record a statement from the Treasury Department as to financial facts that will make no conclusions whatever.

Mr. Carlisle: No conclusions; only figures.

The Special Master: And whatever that statement is, it 1003 will be submitted to the other side, and whether that proves anything or not, of course is another question.

Mr. Anderson: I suppose that ought to be marked plaintiff's Exhibit E-2.

(The paper referred to was filed with the stenographer and marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit E-2.)

Mr. Anderson: I wish to introduce Plaintiff's Exhibit E-3.

Mr. McClintic: That is introduced over our objection, very strongly.

Mr. Anderson: Read the caption, please.

The Special Master: Without stopping to discuss this, how does a valuation, for instance, in 1867, have any legitimate bearing on what the valuation was in 1863; what kind of a door does that open?

Mr. Anderson: I think we will show the bearing.

The Special Master: I will admit this de bene, but with the suggestion that unless some connection is shown which I do not see, it may not be of much value. It cannot do any harm. I shall not give any weight to it to which it is not entitled. It comes right down to 1908. I will hear you on that, I say.

Mr. Harrison: We can show you the bearing, I think, when the time comes.

Mr. Anderson: Are these figures taken from the Auditor's report of West Virginia and Virginia?

Mr. Potter: Yes, sir.

Mr. McClintic: We will not admit anything on that.

Mr. Carlisle: Mr. Potter will testify, I suppose, that these 1004 figures are correct?

Mr. Potter: Yes, sir.

Mr. Anderson: We expect to be able to suggest reasons to your Honor which will be persuasive as to the value of those figures.

Mr. Potter: I said that was taken from the records. It is, with the exception of $9,000,000 introduced as the value of railroads in Virginia between 1867 and 1879, for which we had no report, as covered by the note at the top of the second page.

Mr. Anderson: They were not assessed in Virginia at that time, but we took them—

Mr. Potter: Value in 1880—

Mr. Anderson: Which was probably fifty per cent more—

The Special Master: Do you want to spend any time in inquiring about that?

Mr. Anderson: We wish to introduce this Exhibit as Plaintiff's Exhibit E-4. It is a statement of the value of real and personal property, assessed values, in 1861, taken from the Auditor's report.

(The paper referred to was filed and marked Plaintiff's Exhibit E-4.)

The Special Master: That is all going to be covered by the statements that they are going to get up between them, that we have already agreed on.

Mr. Anderson: If that is introduced, it will be substituted 1005 for this, but we have to have this in order to support the next statement.

The Special Master: Does not this show that you have agreed on the assessed value of real estate for 1863?

Mr. Anderson: Yes.

The Special Master: That is what this shows (Indicating)?

Mr. Anderson: No; personal property.

The Special Master: Then, when you get in the statement that the experts are to agree on—

Mr. Anderson: This is by counties. We do not think we will need the other statement.

The Special Master: If it does not agree with the other statement it will not go for anything, because Mr. Dixcy and Mr. Potter will present a statement signed by both of them, and if this schedule does not agree with that, this schedule will not go for anything. I shall not submit any schedule submitted by Mr. Potter which does not agree with the joint schedule. There is no occasion for duplicating it. Have we not already agreed that Mr. Potter and Mr.

Dixey should give us, first, the assessed valuation of personal property as appears from the official records, in 1860; next in 1861, and next in 1862 and next in 1863; have we not agreed to that?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: That settles the official valuation by counties for those four years.

Mr. Anderson: Except that we insist that in 1863 it was made with reference to Confederate money. 1006

The Special Master: We will hear your argument on that later, but there is no occasion for duplicating a schedule on that.

Mr. Anderson: Well, we will withdraw that.

The Special Master: Now, then, is there anything else you have to offer?

Mr. Anderson: We wish to introduce testimony to show a number of sales of real estate at that period.

Mr. Carlisle: We object to that.

Mr. Anderson: Sales of property?

Mr. Carlisle: Yes, sir.

Mr. Anderson: I would like to recall Mr. Lightfoot.

JOHN B. LIGHTFOOT, JR.,
a witness previously produced and sworn on behalf of the plaintiff, is recalled for further examination; and took the stand as a witness:

Mr. Carlisle: You have gone to the records and segregated certain sales and found the considerations stated in the deeds, which may be true and may be false. Many deeds are made for a consideration of one dollar, and the consideration named in the deed does not prove the value of the property.

Mr. Harrison: If the evidence is of no value, then it will not do you any harm.

Mr. Carlisle: If there is a deed on record which shows that a certain lot which sold for a certain price on a certain day, that does not prove the value of that lot?

Mr. Harrison: It proves something in reference to that 1007 property, yes.

The Special Master: The defendants object to all the evidence that is submitted to Virginia on this line. The plaintiffs now propose to show what the record shows, as I understand it, with reference to a particular lot in 1863.

Mr. Carlisle: Several lots.

Mr. Anderson: A great number of lots.

The Special Master: Well, a number of lots, then.

Mr. Carlisle: 58 or 60, perhaps.

The Special Master: I propose to submit this evidence de bene; but it is subject to all the legal objections made by West Virginia. Now, why do you not put this schedule right in. Mr. Lightfoot, as I understand it, testifies that the computations shown upon that schedule are computations made by him from the original records, and so far as they are made from deeds which purport to show the consideration, they are accurately made.

Mr. Carlisle: From the deeds on record, yes.

The Special Master: Yes, sir. Of course, whether that proves the consideration of that particular sale is another thing, perhaps. Does that cover everything you want?

Mr. Anderson: No, sir. I want to prove by him whether this included all he could trace. We are not only prepared to prove what these properties sold for, but what the assessed value of these properties was.

The Special Master: I understand this schedule states that, and without going over it in detail, I understand it may be stated on the record that Mr. Lightfoot testifies that the figures appearing here are the accurate result of the examination of the 1008 original records, both of conveyances and assessments.

Mr. Anderson: It will not be necessary to encumber the record with the original deeds?

The Special Master: Not unless the other side wishes to do that.

Mr. Carlisle: Oh, no.

The Special Master: That schedule is admitted, and Mr. Lightfoot so testifies.

Mr. Anderson: (Addressing the witness, Mr. Lightfoot.) Please state what proportion of the property that was sold at that time as shown by the records of the State and which took place in Richmond City and Henrico County, Hanover County and Chesterfield County, you show in this schedule?

The Special Master: What proportion of the actual sales that appear upon the record during that period that he has made a note of in this schedule. That calls first for the question whether he examined the record in these various counties for the purpose of determining how many sales were made of real estate.

Mr. Lightfoot: I did, sir, in this way—

The Special Master: Very well. What proportion of the actual sales which you found recorded on the records are represented in this schedule?

Mr. Lightfoot: As to Henrico County, Hanover County and Chesterfield County, they cover all sales which I could find by an examination of the deed books for the year 1863, as to 1009 which I could trace the assessments of that particular property.

The Special Master: Well, now, that does not give any information. How many deeds were on record which you could not trace in the assessments books?

Mr. Lightfoot: I could not give you the number.

Mr. Anderson: What proportion?

Mr. Lightfoot: That would be an estimate.

Mr. Anderson: Have you any idea?

Mr. Lightfoot: That would simply be an estimate.

The Special Master: Well, what is your estimate?

Mr. Lightfoot: I should say over one-half.

Mr. Anderson: Because they were parts of tracts of land—

The Special Master: That is immaterial.

Now, then, anything further?

Mr. Anderson: You did not say about Richmond City.

Mr. Lightfoot: For Richmond City the same applies, except that I have not gone through all of the deed books as carefully as I did in the counties. I may have omitted ten or twelve or fifteen deeds, as to which assessments could have been traced; but as to Richmond City I have not made as careful examination of all the deed books as I made in the other cases.

The Special Master: As to Richmond City, your examination is not exhaustive, as I understand it?

Mr. Lightfoot: That is correct.

The Special Master: Does this schedule show where these various properties are located, in what counties?

Mr. Lightfoot: It does, yes, sir. 1010

The Special Master: Yes, I see it.

Mr. Lightfoot: They show the location within the county or city.

Cross Examination.

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. What period was covered by your examination?

A. It shows on the outside of the schedule, April, May, June, July, and August of 1863.

Mr. Anderson: I desire to file the certificate as to the assessment of those identical properties in 1863. This is a complementary schedule and follows the other, and is subject to the same objection.

(Paper handed to the stenographer and marked Plaintiff's Exhibit E-5.)

Mr. Anderson: Please explain the connection between Exhibits E-4 and E-5.

Mr. Lightfoot: When you examine the certified assessments made by the auditor, you will find one piece of property stated as for three years, in some instances. That was done for the reason that the description in a deed which is shown on this exhibit will be described by the name of the place, for instance. I will take one instance. In the deed it is described as Peoria. On the land book for the same year, you would not find the description "Peoria," but on the land book for 1862 you would find that property described as "Peoria." In those cases I have taken it for 1863 and then for 1862, and if necessary have gone to 1861, until I have located the same description on the land book as contained in the deed.

The Special Master: Does the land book contain descriptions of the property?

Mr. Lightfoot: Yes; so you can identify it. 1011

The Special Master: When a certain piece of land assessed to A has been conveyed by A, is the description on your tax book so complete that you can identify it with the deed to Mr. A?

Mr. Lightfoot: Yes, sir. In those cases where I could not identify it I have left it out.

The Special Master: When it comes to the books, do you mean assessment books contain such a description by feet and distances that you could identify that with the land conveyed in the deed?

Mr. Lightfoot: Yes.

Mr. Anderson: They give the number of the lot and the number of feet front, and so forth.

The Special Master: Well, does this list you give here give the full description that appears in the assessment books?

Mr. Lightfoot: Yes, sir; it gives the exact description.

The Special Master: The list you have submitted as being complementary contains all the description that appears on the assessment books?

Mr. Lightfoot: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Then, whether it is identical or not is a matter for argument?

Mr. Conley: Whether or not we are getting more, does 1012 it contain anything that the books do not show; does the exhibit just filed contain anything more?

The Special Master: I understand him to say they are exact copies.

Mr. Carlisle: The question is whether his report contains anything more than appears on the assessment book?

The Special Master: I understood him to say that his report, so far as descriptions were concerned, was an exact copy.

Mr. Lightfoot: Yes, sir.

* * * * * * * * *

The Special Master: Finish on paragraph 5, then— 1013

Mr. Anderson: I have now the exhibit which shows the purpose of that testimony, the exhibits filed under paragraph No 5.

The Special Master: This is simply a computation?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: That can be made any time. It can 1014 be made after the case is printed as well as any other time.

Mr. Anderson: This will be plaintiff's Exhibit E-6.

(The paper referred to was filed by the Stenographer and marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit E-6.)

Mr. McClintic: We reserve the right to make our computations later on that.

The Special Master: You can make them all in the closing argument.

Mr. McClintic: There is a difference between argument and evidence.

The Special Master: There will not be any distinction as far as I am concerned. The computation made by Mr. Potter is subject to the cross examination of your experts, the same as if it was given as oral testimony. It has no more weight and no less weight.

Mr. McClintic: If evidence does not have any more weight than argument, then I will consent to it.

The Special Master: This is simply a computation made by the expert, and if it is questioned, I will make the computation myself.

Mr. McClintic: I understand, but I also understand that they are offering it as proof.

The Special Master: Well, you may have Mr. Dixey make the same computation, and if he does not reach the same result, submit it to me. A fact that the expert swears to has no more 1015 weight with me than if you stated it in argument.

Mr. McClintic: If that is understood, very well, then.

Mr. Anderson: These figures may be modified.

The Special Master: Either side can put into the case at any time any computations they see fit to make, and they can have experts make them. The computations will not bind me.

Now, is that all?

Mr. Anderson: We reserve the right to file an amended statement—

* * * * * * * * *

Mr. Anderson: We have not finished with number 5. I ask 1017 that this be filed as an exhibit.

(Paper handed to the stenographer and filed in the case, marked Plaintiff's Exhibit E-7.)

Mr. Harrison: This is a statement that supports the summary handed in just now.

The Special Master: This is their computation predicated upon what they have already put in?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

Mr. Carlisle: It goes in under our objection?

The Special Master: Yes.

Mr. Anderson: You prepared that?

Mr. Lightfoot: Yes.

Mr. Anderson: And it is correct according to the records?

Mr. Lightfoot: Yes.

Mr. Harrison: We have never gotten to F, yet.

Mr. McClintic: I want to put in something on No. 5, if you are through.

[Vol. 7. July 2, 1909. West Virginia Exhibits 1, 2 and 3.]

Mr. McClintic: Yesterday I gave each one a copy of a 1018 paper taken from the United States Census reports. We have the Census report here.

Mr. Anderson: We object to that.

The Special Master: Yes; it is objected to, but I will admit it de bene.

Mr. McClintic: I also want to file a table showing the slave population by counties in West Virginia in 1860 and over and under the age of twelve years, as shown by the Census of 1860, 1019 and the number of slaves assessed in West Virginia. Also a table showing slave population by counties in Virginia in 1860 over and under the age of 12 years, as shown by Census of 1860, and number of slaves assessed in Virginia in 1860. This was taken from the Census reports and the auditor's reports already in.

Mr. Anderson: We know nothing about that.

The Special Master: I understand that. That is admitted, subject to objection by Virginia. We understand that they are to have their experts compare them with the original sources of information, and they can file a contrary report, if they desire to do so, if they do not agree that this is correct.

v.

THE STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA
Defendant.

Depositions of William G. Taylor and others taken at the offices of the Attorney General of Virginia, Richmond, Virginia, on the 4th and 5th days of June, nineteen hundred and nine (beginning at 10 o'clock A. M., on the 4th), pursuant to the annexed notice, to be read as evidence by the Special Master and the Court in Chancery cause now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States in which the Commonwealth of Virginia is complainant and the State of West Virginia is defendant.

Present on behalf of the Commonwealth of Virginia William A. Anderson, Attorney General of Virginia, and John B. Moon.

Present on behalf of the State of West Virginia, William G. Conley, Attorney General of West Virginia.

Note: The taking of these depositions was adjourned from 1025 the office of the Attorney General to the Court Room of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.

Major Robert W. Hunter being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

By the Attorney General of Virginia:

Q. 1. Please state where you reside, and what official position, if any, you now hold?

A. My legal residence is Winchester, Valley of Virginia, and I am now Secretary of Virginia Military Record, with my office in the Capitol at Richmond, Virginia.

Q. 2. Where were you during the War between the States and if you were connected with the Confederate Army, please state with what commands, and what positions or offices you held ?

A. I was Adjutant of the Second Virginia Regiment of the Stonewall Brigade. For a considerable period, especially when James A. Walker was in command, I was acting Adjutant General of the Stonewall Brigade. At the time of the battle of Gettysburg I was promoted Major of Jackson's old Division, then commanded by General Edward Johnson. Was Adjutant General of Edward Johnson's Division until the 12th of May, 1864, when I became the Adjutant General of Major General John B Gordon, commanding the Division in Early's corps, and remained with him until Appomattox.

Q. 3. State what civil office, if any, you held during that period?

A. I was a member of the Virginia Legislature from the County of Berkeley, Virginia (now West Virginia) during 1026 the years 1863 and 1864. It may have been earlier than that. I didn't take my seat except occasionally.

Q. 5. Through what portions of the present territory of Virginia did you travel or march during that period?

A. Our first service was at Harper's Ferry; from there we retired to Winchester, from Winchester transferred to the Battle of Manassas, remained about Centerville until the Command was ordered back to Winchester, in the Valley of Virginia, after Jackson was appointed Major General in command of the Valley.

Q. 6. After that?

A. Then we were chiefly in the Valley of Virginia.

Q. 7. Where did you serve in the year 1862 and 1863?

A. Then came the battle of Kernstown, and afterwards what is known as Jackson's campaign, which covered the entire Valley and extended over towards West Virginia. Then as we returned we crossed over into the Luray Valley—had a fight at Front Royal. I was in the Valley chiefly with Jackson's Army, largely about Winchester and the upper parts of the Valley.

Q. 8. Did you go with Jackson's command to Richmond in July, 1862?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 9. Did you go with Jackson's command in the march toward Rappahannock?

A. In the battle of Slaughter Mountain I did. I was in that engagement.

Q. 10. Were you with Jackson's command in the campaign 1027 culminating in the Second Battle of Manassas?

A. I was, sir. I was in the railroad cut.

Q. 11. Were you with the Army of General Lee in the march into Maryland—the battle of Sharpsburg?

A. I was, sir.

Q. 12. You remember the date of the battle of Sharpsburg?

A. The 17th day of September, 1862.

Q. 13. You were in the retreat through Northern Virginia back to Richmond?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 14. Were you in the Fredericksburg campaign of 1862-63?

A. Yes, sir. We were in camp in Caroline County in that winter.

Q. 15. Were you in the army during the campaign of General Lee in 1863?

A. At Gettysburg?

Q. 16. Yes, sir.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 17. Now, Major Hunter, please kindly state what was the condition of the farms, and generally of the buildings upon the farms, the fences, and real estate generally in the portions of Virginia with which you were familiar during that period, as compared with their condition prior to that period?

A. In the early part of the War property rights were respected to a very considerable extent by both armies. Of course, necessarily the occupation of any territory by an army entails very large damage to that country. A great many fences were destroyed, and a great deal of damage was necessarily done. Now, later on in the War when orders were given to devastate the 1028 country, the country became thoroughly ravaged, fences gone, mills and barns destroyed—a general destruction.

Q. 18. Was there any observable damage done prior to June, 1863, to the fencing, forests and buildings in the portions of Virginia to which you have referred, by reason of the occupation of the country by the two armies?

A. Very considerable damage was done by the occupation of the territory by both armies, necessarily.

Q. 19. What was the effect of the occupation of the country by the two armies upon the forests and timber lands in those regions?

A. A great many of them around Winchester were destroyed almost, and in other parts of the country where our army encamped for a considerable length of time they were almost destroyed. Down in Caroline we made houses of wood. We cut down an enormous amount of timber. We used a large amount of fire wood.

Q. 20. How long were the two armies encamped in the region about Fredericksburg—in 1862-63—prior to the battle of Chancellorsville, which was in May, 1863?

A. McDowell's Army was in the neighborhood of Fredericksburg during the seven days' fight at Richmond. That country was occupied by the Federal Army very largely. McDowell I think had 30,000 men at least. While The Jackson campaign chiefly was in progress, he occupied that territory.

Q. 21. Where was General Hooker's Army in camp later 1029 in that year?

A. First was Burnside. They were encamped from the Rappahannock to the Potomac—ranged over that whole country. They had a base on the rivers near by, and at Alexandria.

Q. 22. Where was Hooker's Army encamped?

A. Hooker's Army was encamped from Stafford up along about the same region of country that had been occupied by Burnside's Army.

Q. 23. How would you describe, Major Hunter, the effect of the occupation of this region by the Federal and the Confederate Armies respectively?

A. To a very large extent it paralyzed all the agricultural operations. Destroyed fences, and made the pursuit of agriculture almost impossible, except in a very unsatisfactory way.

Q. 24. And now will you kindly state what was the condition of the agricultural interests in Virginia, and industrial interests in Virginia generally, outside of the sphere of occupation by the Federal Army,—inside of the Confederate lines—as to whether the farms were kept up, and as to what was the character of the tillage during that period.

A. The farming operations in other portions of the State not occupied by the Army were indirectly affected, and affected very seriously, but the fact that the labor necessary for carrying on agricultural operations was largely in the Army, or engaged in the support of the Army one way or another. Then there was the negro population—well to their credit it may be said of them that they did remarkably well under all the circumstances—yet a great deal of apprehension in regard to them was felt, and they were being induced away very frequently. 1030

Q. 25. What, within your knowledge and observation, was the result of the operation of the causes that you have mentioned, upon the actual value of real estate in the territory now constituting the State of Virginia—in June, 1863?

A. Well, sir, that is almost entirely a matter of conjecture, but I should suppose that it would be fair—of course I just hazard this—to state that the values were destroyed one-half at least, taking the whole State a large. It is like the value of a buggy when a horse is running away with it. There was a condition of affairs existing which made it impossible to base any satisfactory judgment as to values.

Q. 26. Are you prepared to say whether there was or was not a deterioration in value, and whether or not that deterioration was great or small?

A. There was a great deterioration in values. In the first place our currency began to be very valueless at that time. Began to depreciate very decidedly.

Q. 27. Do you happen to know of any actual sales of real estate during that period, in that territory, and if so, how did the prices compare with the prices before the War, taking gold and silver as a standard of value?

A. Well, a small amount of gold would buy—I couldn't say how much—but relatively three or four times as much as it would at any other time. Sometimes a very much larger amount. It had an exceptional value brought about by the condition of affairs.

Q. 28. Please state, if you can, what the value of the Moss 1031 Neck plantation on the Rappahannock River was in sound money before the War?

A. I should say, without knowing certainly as to values in that region of the country, that it would have been worth $50,000.00. I suppose the house on it cost $30,000.00.

Q. 29. Will you now state what, within your knowledge and observation, was the condition of personal property, farming implements, vehicles, household effects, and other tangible personal property, in June, 1863, as compared with its condition prior to the beginning of the War, throughout the present State of Virginia—as far as your observation extends?

A. By that time—1863—pretty much everything was out of repair. Most of the skilled labor was in the Army, and the workshops, wagon shops, except such as were under government control, has, to a very large extent, broken up.

Q. 30. Had there been any destruction of personal property, destruction and carrying off of live-stock and consumption of live-stock throughout the State of Virginia during that time—had it been diminished in quantity?

A. Yes, very largely, very largely.

Q. 31. Was it in as good condition as it was at the beginning of the War, and before the War?

A. Nothing like, sir. Everything was out of repair, vehicles, farming utensils, and things of that sort.

Q. 32. Would you be prepared to make an estimate of the depreciation of that property in value—as to the specific property and as to the value of the total or aggregate property?

A. I don't think my estimate would be of any value. The 1032 fact is my mind was not intent upon those matters at all at that time, and it is only an estimate that I would have to hazard now at this period. There are other gentlemen here who have given their attention to values. If I could get enough to buy a uniform and horse, that was all I wanted.

Q. 33. What was the currency of the people of what now constitutes the State of Virginia during that time?

A. At first we had a great many bank notes, and then we had Virginia Treasury notes, but Confederate currency was the currency.

Q. 34. What was the currency in 1863?

A. Confederate.

Q. 35. What was the standard of value within Confederate Virginia with reference to which all transactions between man and man and between the government and citizens were conducted, and all values measured—in 1863?

A. I think the impressment began about that time by the government, and I think a scale of prices to be paid for wheat, corn, bacon, and other supplies was fixed. I think that was fixed by the War Department—the Commissary-General under the authority of Congress of the Confederate government.

Q. 36. What was the measure of values then among the people—what currency—in 1863?

A. Well, it was impossible to get gold except in very small amounts. Very frequently Confederate money was 4 for 1, 5 for 1, 6 for 1, 7 for 1, 8 for 1. The Legislature began at $4.00, then went 1033 to $6.00, $12.00, and I think got up to $40.00 per diem.

Q. 37. In what currency were all those transactions to which you refer?

A. Confederate money.

Q 38. In what currency were taxes paid?

A. Confederate money. There were, of course, Virginia treasury notes. I think pretty much all sorts of paper would go to some extent.

Q. 39. As I understand you, you were an officer in the Confederate Army during all that period, but served at intervals in the Legislature of the State?

A. Yes. sir.

Q. 40. While you were in the Legislature was your attention drawn to the economic and financial condition of the State?

A. Yes, sir, in a very general way, but my attendance upon the Legislature was coming and going. I used it in order to get brief furloughs, but that was about all. I was more subject to the Army than I was to the Legislature. It was only when our Army was not on the march that I was here.

Q. 41. Please state, Major Hunter, what was the condition of the highways and bridges, within your knowledge and observation, in the present State of Virginia during the period to which your testimony has already referred, and particularly during the year 1863?

A. The highways were in a very wretched condition. I don't know that there was any provision for the repair of the roads at all during the War. There were no toll-gates. They were 1034 not kept up. In our marches we did not respect roads. We marched over the country generally—the best ground we could find.

Q. 42. To what extent were the highway bridges kept up?

A. A great many of them were burnt under orders from one Army or the other, and very frequently never repaired until after the War. Never rebuilt. Of course, where bridges were absolutely necessary for Army operations they had to be repaired.

Q. 43. What was the condition of the railroads in the present territory of Virginia during that time, and other lines of communication, both over land and by water?

A. The railroads were in a very wretched condition. The supplies of rails had largely given out. The engines became almost valueless. That is stated very clearly in a paper that will appear in the Times-Dispatch on Sunday, by Professor Mallet. The Ordnance Department of the Confederate government and the railroads helped each other out in every way possible. That is all stated in this article of Professor Mallet's—a very interesting one.

Note.—The State of West Virginia, by her Attorney-General, objects to each and all of the foregoing questions and answers, because they are not relevant and germane to the issues in this cause, and for other reasons apparent in said questions and answers; and without waiving said objection, proceeds to cross examine Major Hunter. 1035

Cross Examination.

By the Attorney-General of West Virginia:

XQ. 1. Major Hunter, you have stated in your direct examination that an order was given to devastate the country during the War between the States—wasn't that order given in 1863?

A. I can't recall the date of the order. I have it in my office. There was an order from General Grant through General Halleck to General Hunter, and that order spoke of devastating the Valley so that a "crow would have to carry its provender."

XQ. 2. That order was issued after General Grant succeeded General McClellan?

A. Yes. sir.

XQ. 3. How long after General Grant succeeded General McClellan or General Meade was this order issued?

A. I can't answer that, Mr. Conley, without reference to the records; but a great deal of damage was done by General Milroy, and other officers in command. General Pope's Army did a great deal of damage. His orders were for the devastation.

XQ. 4. But this was all after June, 1863, was it not?

A. Milroy was in Winchester just prior to the battle of Gettysburg, and Gettysburg was in 1863, and Milroy had issued orders for the indiscriminate use of all property belonging to what he termed rebels. The country was entirely occupied by men of that class. I have a copy of Pope's order which was for the use of prop- 1036 erty of the citizens for Army purposes. This was before the battle of Second Manassas—at the time of the Slaughter Mountain fight.

XQ. 5. In your Army campaigns you have pretended to describe in your direct examination, your mind was particularly directed to the maneuvers of the Army, and not to the condition of the country or property through which you passed, was it not?

A. Yes, sir, almost entirely. It was only incidentally that I observed the property destruction. Of course, it impressed itself on the mind of everyone. You could see it around you wherever you went.

XQ. 6. What territory in the present boundaries of West Virginia did you cover during the period of the Civil War, prior to June 20, 1863?

A. Well, at times we had Berkely and Jefferson Counties—the lower Valley—and we had Hampshire, Hardy Counties, and that country to some extent, then Greenbrier, Monroe and Kanawha, and the counties around Kanawha.

XQ. 7. Were there any bridges destroyed in this territory during your trips through there?

A. The bridges across the Shenandoah were frequently destroyed —sometimes rebuilt and sometimes not. In the retreat of either Army after crossing a river they burned the bridge if was possible—if the pursuit was not too rapid.

XQ. 8. Whose command were you with in the trip through Greenbrier, Monroe and Kanawha counties?

A. Well, I never was there. I just spoke of that from my 1037 knowledge. I was never with any command in that part of the country.

Re-Direct Examination.

By the Attorney-General of Virginia:

Q. 1. What was the number of battles or engagements between the Federal and Confederate forces within the territory embraced by the present State of Virginia, and what were the number in the territory embraced within the present State of West Virginia, during the War?

A. In the numbers that I give you, you will understand that I range from battles down to outpost engagements and skirmishes—all of them of sufficient dignity to be mentioned in the reports of the Union and Confederate Armies. There were 1,004 in Virginia and 364 in West Virginia. In West Virginia, as a rule, they were of a minor character—not on as large a scale as in Virginia.

Q. 2. In which territory were the engagements of any considerable magnitude and importance, and in which territory were the principal Armies of the two cambatants engaged?

A. In the State of Virginia. There was no great battle within the limits of West Virginia.

The signature of the witness is waived by consent.

Note.—The State of West Virginia, by her Attorney-General, objects to each and all of the foregoing questions and answers on redirect examination, because they are not relevant and germane to the issues in this cause, and for other reasons apparent in 1038 said questions and answers.

MR. W. W. SCOTT,
being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

By Mr. John B. Moon:

Q. 1. Mr. Scott, what official position do you hold in connection with any Virginia office?

A. I am known officially, sir, as the State Law Librarian of Virginia.

Q. 2. Where were you during the War from 1861 to 1865?

A. I was in the Confederate Army, except during the period from about July 17th, 1862, until about the 1st of November, 1863. During that time I was at the Military Institute, and for a short while at my home in Orange County.

Q. 3. Your home was in Orange County, Virginia?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 4. What portions of the State were you in during the War—prior to 1863?

A. Well, I was at Harper's Ferry in April, 1861, and in all the subsequent operations of Jackson's Army until we came to Manassas. Spent the winter at Manassas, and fell back with the Army to the line of Rappahannock, and when Ewell's Division was detached and joined General Jackson's Command at Swift Run Gap near Elkton. I was in the Valley campaign with Jackson—not partici- 1039 pating in the battle at McDowell—but I was in what was known as the Valley campaign from beginning to end. In the combats with Banks, beginning at Front Royal, through Winchester to Hallltown within a few miles of Harper's Ferry, thence back to the Cross Keys and Port Republic, in Rockingham County, thence to the seven days' battles around Richmond, and thence to Gordonsville, in Orange County, where I was discharged from the Army, being under age, on the 16th of July, 1862.

Q. 5. Have you had occasion in connection with any history or publication that you have gotten up, to pay attention and note the financial condition of matters in the present State of Virginia, during the War?

A. I have, sir, in a history of my own county. I have had occasion to make a comparison of the values as stated officially in the Auditor's reports in 1860 & 1861, and 1866.

Q. 6. From your judgment and observation during that period of the War, was there any increase or diminution in the actual intrinsic value of real estate—from January 1, 1861, to June, 1863—if so, what was the difference?

A. Well, if the intrinsic value is to be estimated at all by the market value, or salable value, there was a very considerable decrease.

Q. 7. What was that diminution—what proportion or percentage?

A. Well, I should say, sir, that lands that would have brought $40.00 an acre in say 1860-61 before the War came on, brought very little in comparison more than that in the currency of the 1040 country along in 1862-63.

Q. 8. What was that currency worth in 1863?

A. Well, that currency was very much depreciated. My recollection is that it got as low as at least 6 for 1. I wouldn't testify from memory what the precise depreciation was.

Q. 9. Then, according to the scale, real estate was worth in 1863 less than one-half of what it was in 1861?

A. Undoubtedly, in gold values. Hard money values. Gold and silver were about the same at that time. Silver was a little higher, I believe.

Q. 10. Well, what was the comparison in values of personal property between those two years, taking into consideration the diminution in amount as well as in value?

A. Well, sir, my recollection is pretty distinct that when I joined the Army in 1863 (you know they appraised the horses of the soldiers in the Cavalry) the horse that I was riding was appraised at $1,200.00 in Confederate money, and $100.00 would have been a good price for him in gold—a big price, but for the scarcity of horses then.

Q. 11. Then what, on the whole, would have been the percentage of diminution in values of personalty, considering the diminution in quantity, and in value also?

A. Well, the way I would look at it, personal property of all sorts had become so scarce that by reason of its scarcity it had a fictitious value almost in Confederate money. There were not any horses to spare left, very few cows, very little furniture, very few farming utensils, and very little live stock.

Q. 12. What percentage of diminution in actual value of the 1041 personalty occurred between those periods?

A. Well, I would say that there was ten times as much personal property in 1861 as there was in 1863. When you come to the values, I cannot speak.

Q. 13. Do you mean ten times as much in intrinsic value?

A. Yes, sir. The property was there in 1861 and in 1863 it wasn't there.

Q. 14. What was the currency of the country in 1863?

A. I was paid off once—the first time I think—in State Bank notes; after that I never saw anything but Confederate money, and these little shinplasters. Taxes were paid in Confederate currency—it was all known practically as Confederate currency, except the provision of the Confederate law that one-tenth, I think, of the products of the farm had to be paid in kind—wheat, corn, tobacco, potatoes—on everything that a soldier could eat, you had to pay a tax in kind.

Q. 15. You speak of being paid off in Virginia Treasury notes, was that early in the War?

A. I said I was paid in Virginia Bank notes. The first thing paid to me as a soldier, as I remember, was Virginia Bank notes.

Q. 16. That was in 1861?

A. In 1861. My recollection is that it was paid in Virginia Bank notes.

Q. 17. After that time were all payments in Confederate money?

A. So far as I remember, yes, sir. I saw nothing else during the War but Confederate money, and these shinplasters that I 1042 spoke of, and occasionally Virginia Treasury notes.

Q. 18. Did any of them pass at any higher rate than Confederate money?

A. All on one common level.

Q. 19. All taken as Confederate money?

A. Yes. sir.

Q. 20. Then I understand that Confederate money was the standard measure of value in 1863?

A. There was none other that I know of.

Note.—The State of West Virginia, by her Attorney-General, objects to each and all of the foregoing questions and answers, because they are not relevant and germane to the issues in this cause, and for other reasons apparent in said questions and answers; and without waiving said objection, proceeds to cross examine the witness.

Cross Examination.

By the Attorney-General of West Virginia:

XQ. 1. Mr. Scott, when you speak of the values, you are only speaking as to your opinion, are you not—as to the measure of values?

A. Well, I should say of my own knowledge, sir, as based on facts. Some things would be my opinion, but I was careful to state only facts which came under my personal observation.

XQ. 2. When you stated in your direct examination that 1043 there was ten times as much personal property, and that the property was of ten times the value in 1861 as compared with 1863, is not that simply your opinion?

A. Well, it is my opinion as to matters at large, sir. It is my knowledge as to matters within a restricted area. I know, for instance, the conditions of my own immediate neighborhood, for I was there in 1863. You remember (no, you were too young to remember) that, in the first place, there was a call for contributions of horses and wagons to the army, which were freely rendered, and after the spirit of contribution became exhausted there were impressments. The negro slaves were drafted by a court order. Two hundred at one time were taken from the County of Orange in 1863, which is a small county, and sent down to work on the defenses around Richmond.

XQ. 3. What time in 1863?

A. If you will let me look at this book I will tell you. I have copied the order. I can't give you the exact time without referring to that. I copied it from the court order. At a special term, January, 1863, two hundred able bodied slaves—negro men—

XQ. 4. Mr. Scott, when you spoke of the increased value of horses along about 1863, isn't it true that the value of horses, as a matter of fact, was much more at that time, because they were more in demand?

A. Yes, sir, and fewer of them, that is in my judgment, sir.

XQ. 5. When you spoke of the value of Confederate money, you meant that Confederate money was used as the medium of exchange?

A. Yes, sir, as the medium of exchange.

XQ. 6. And not as a unit of value? 1044

A. It was our only unit of value. The Confederate dollar was the only unit of value that we had. It wasn't considered loyal to traffic in gold and silver in this old Commonwealth during the war.

XQ. 7. On what was the value based?

A. You mean the value of the Confederate money—it was based on an abiding faith, sir, that we were going to be a nation and pay our debts.

XQ. 8. What did you measure the value of the Confederate money by?

A. Well, I don't know that I catch the meaning, Mr. Attorney General. I would be glad to answer frankly, sir.

XQ. 9. You must have had some comparison of value?

A. Well, we expected with absolute faith that the Confederate States would pay these notes dollar for dollar. We thought they meant a dollar measured in gold and silver— the standard value.

XQ. 10. Then is it not a fact your Confederate money after all was measured in value with gold and silver?

A. An abiding faith, yes, sir.

Redirect Examination.

Q. 1. Will you please state what month it was in which your horse was valued at $1,200.00?

A. It must have been sir, the very last of October, or the 1045 very first of November, 1863.

Note: The State of West Virginia, by her Attorney General objects to the foregoing question and answer, because it is not relevant and germane to the issues in this cause, and for other reasons apparent in said question and answer; and without waiving said objection, proceeds to re-cross examine the witness.

Recross Examination.

By the Attorney General of West Virginia:

XQ. 1. By what method was that horse valued?

A. The rule was that when your horse was killed (we furnished our own horses)—when the horse was killed the Quartermaster paid you for it, and in order to have a basis for payment when you joined the regiment your horse was appraised and reported to the Quartermaster as of such a value, and when he was killed, they paid you that much, and you could probably get one-twelfth as good a horse by that time for that amount.

XQ. 2. What was the assessed value of that horse as shown by your assessment books?

A. Well, sir, I was hardly more than a lad in short breeches. It was my father's horse, not mine. I said in my preliminary examination, sir, that $100.00 would have been an excellent price for him.

XQ. 3. And that was about the value it was assessed at in your assessment books?

A. Well, I couldn't tell you about that. I was about 17 1046 years old, I think, in 1863.

XQ. 4. Haven't you obtained the value of the assessment at that time, since then?

A. Hardly of that particular horse.

XQ. 5. Of horses generally?

A. Well, I will say, as I said in the beginning, that horses of that character would sell around about $100.00.

XQ. 6. Were they assessed at more or less than their selling price?

A. That is a matter of the taxpayer's conscience—he takes an oath—

XQ. 7. I am not speaking of any particular horse. I am speaking as to a matter of fact—what the assessment shows during that period.

A. I am wholly unable to answer that question, sir. I never saw a tax ticket until after the war. I don't want to evade the question.

XQ. 8. How long after the war?

A. Well, I was twenty years old the day after Appomattox, and I paid no taxes myself until 1867.

XQ. 9. I believe you stated you were State Librarian of Virginia?

A. I was the State Librarian. Am now the State Law Librarian.

XQ. 10. Will you examine the assessment book of personal property in your county in 1863, and state from it what the assessed value of horses were at that time?

A. If I can have access to that book, sir. I have published a a tabulated statement—

XQ. 11. On page 173 of the book published by yourself, en- 1047
titled "History of Orange County, Virginia," you have for the year 1860, given the number of horses as 2,991, and the total assessed value thereof, $150,328.00, what would be the average assessed value of those horses in that county for that year—would it not be in round numbers about $50.00 each?

A. It would be that sum ($150,328.00) divided by the number of horses. What the apportionment is would be the assessed value —I can't do it in my head.

XQ. 12. Well now, that being true, you would not pretend to say, would you, that horses, cattle, and other personal property were assessed in Confederate money?

A. In 1861 there was no Confederate money. It hadn't come out. The assessment was made as of the first of February, you know.

XQ. 13. Well, in 1866 how were the assessments made?

A. In 1866 they were made on the basis of the United States currency?

XQ. 14. Will you examine the personal property book of your county for the year 1863, and give me the assessed value of horses and cows for that year?

A. I haven't the access to that book. I will do it if you will give me the book.

The signature of the witness is waived by consent.

Note: Since the taking of these depositions, Mr. Scott 1048 has examined the Commissioners returns to the Auditor of Public Accounts from Orange County, as requested in XQ. 14, just above, and made the following statement:

"I have examined the Commissioner's Returns to the Auditor of Public Accounts for 1863, from Orange County.

The average assessment, for taxation, was about $160.00 for horses, about $40.00 for cattle, for all ages and conditions. This, I think, was about four times as much as the same stock, or stock of like kind, would have been assessed at in 1860, for taxation."

COLONEL JOHN P. BRANCH,
being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

By the Attorney General of Virginia:

Q. 1. What is your place of residence?

A. Richmond, Virginia.

Q. 2. What is your occupation, and what position, if any, do you hold?

A. I am President of the Merchants National Bank of Richmond, Virginia.

Q. 3. About how long have you been president of that bank?

A. About 28 years, I would say.

Q. 4. Where did you reside during the War between the States?

A. Petersburg, Virginia.

Q. 5. Did you have any connection with any business or 1049 banking house at that time—during the War between the States?

A. Yes, sir. I was partner with my father in business during the war.

Q. 6. What was the style of the banking house?

A. In the early part of the war we were commission merchants representing the farming interests of the State. Afterwards we went in the banking business during the War.

Q. 7. Did you have any connection with the Confederate Army during the War.

A. Was a soldier, and surrendered with General Lee at Appomattox C. H.

Q. 8. Over what portions of Virginia did you travel or march during the War, Colonel?

A. I was stationed mostly around Petersburg—in the Provost Marshal Department most of the time.

Q. 9. State, if you please, what, within your observation and knowledge, was the condition of the fencing and buildings and lands of the present State of Virginia during the War, and particularly during the year 1863, two years after the War had commenced—as to whether they had deteriorated or improved in value during that period?

A. Deteriorated very much.

Q. 10. What was the condition of the fences upon those farms?

A. Worse than they were in 1861 by far.

Q. 11. What was the condition of the buildings?

A. Worse too.

Q. 12. What was the condition of the buildings in the towns 1050 —for instance the City of Petersburg, or other towns with which you are familiar—whether they had been kept in repair or deteriorated?

A. Deteriorated in value very much when General Grant got to Petersburg and shelled the town.

Q. 13. What was the condition of the personal property in the State—live-stock, farming utensils, vehicles of every kind, household effects, furniture, and so on— as to whether it had depreciated in value during that period?

A. Depreciated in value very much.

Q. 14. What was the currency in use in Virginia during that time—in 1863?

A. Just after the War commenced the banks made very large loans to the Government in bank notes, and for a few months that money was distributed, but, of course, that gave out quickly and Confederate money was the currency from that time on, except what was issued by the cities. All of the cities in Virginia issued, most of them, what was known as shinplasters, and all of them were repudiated except Petersburg, where I was born, and she paid every one dollar for dollar.

Q. 15. What was the standard of value with reference to which all transactions were made in 1863?

A. Confederate money.

Q. 16. If gold was used at all, how was it treated—as a commodity?

A. Bought and sold as a commodity. Didn't circulate at all.

Q. 17. Have the books of the firms of which you were a member been preserved?

A. Yes, sir; they are all preserved, but I haven't been able 1051 to find all of them. I have found some of them.

Q. 18. Did you keep yourself informed as to the transactions of your house, upon your visits to your home, and at intervals during the War?

A. I would say that I knew from time to time what was going on, but not all the time.

Q. 19. Not in detail.

A. No, sir.

Q. 20. You were familiar with transactions that were going on in the communities in which you were at that time—Petersburg and Richmond?

A. Yes, sir; a general view of them, yes, sir.

Q. 21. You have said that there was a deterioration in the value of both real and personal property in 1863 as compared with its value before the War began?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 22. Are you prepared to say what the deterioration in the actual values of personal property in Virginia, and of real property were, between January, 1861, and June, 1863?

A. Personal property was very much depreciated for over two years.

Q. 23. Are you prepared to say as a minimum what that depreciation was—any particular property?

A. Flour sold in May, 1863, for less than $3.00 a barrel in gold.

Q. 24. What was it worth in 1861 about?

A. I would say never less than $5.00 a barrel, and some- 1052 times as high as $10.00. In 1847 it brought over $10.00 a barrel. I remember that, because that was the year of the Irish famine.

Q. 25. Do you remember what flour and wheat sold at in Virginia in 1856, or along there after the Crimean War?

A. I think wheat went up $2.00 a bushel in that year. I would say that the price of wheat in Virginia previous to the War was 90 cents to $1.20, according to the crop. It may be interesting to you for me to state some facts in regard to the South, and Virginia in particular. We were an exporting people. For instance, take the South, the whole cotton crop went up. Now when you come to Virginia, Virginia exported tobacco, wheat, and corn, and when the War commenced all that export business suffered you know. We couldn't get it out. Of course everything was very much depreciated. Farm supplies were very much depreciated in prices because there was no demand, except what we could sell to the Army.

There were one or two exceptions—we might state horses which were very much needed for the cavalry and artillery. Everything got so scarce that General Lee on his retreat from Richmond and Petersburg to Appomattox C. H.—his troops were fed on corn. And when we got up to Appomattox C. H. we didn't have that. We surrendered on Sunday morning. After that General Grant sent in a big supply of corn and everything. Cotton sold as low as 2 and 3 cents a pound on the gold and silver value.

Q. 26. How was it with tobacco?

A. That didn't sell much better. One reason why tobacco sold so low was that there was nowhere to keep it. The barns were all burnt. The negroes were much depressed in prices. I 1053 bought a servant in July, 1863, on the basis of about $225.00 in gold. That servant would have brought certainly $1,200.00 in 1860 previous to the election.

Q. 27. What was the effect of the War upon the value of negro slaves?

A. It depreciated them very much.

Q. 28. It depreciated their actual value with reference to hard money as a standard of value?

A. Yes, sir, very much. As I think I told you, in July, 1863, I bought a servant for about $225.00 in gold.

Q. 29. And he would have been worth at least $1,200.00 before the War?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 30. What was gold selling for in May and June, 1863, as shown by the books of your house?

A. In April, 1863, it sold for 6 to 1, in July it sold for from 9 to 1 to 10 to 1.

Q. 31. You know what it sold for in May?

A. Gold was appreciating all the time and Confederate money was depreciating, so I would say it certainly sold higher than that in May and June.

Q. 32. In June was it higher?

A. Necessarily, it couldn't have been any less. As you see here in April it sold for 6 to 1, and in July it sold for from 9 to 1 to 10 to 1. So you see in 3 months it had gone up. In August it sold for 15 for 1.

Q. 33. What would you say would be a fair estimate of the depreciation of real and personal property in Virginia in 1054 June, 1863, as compared with its value, say, in January, 1861—I mean its actual value?

A. I don't consider that I know enough to express an opinion in regard to real estate. It was very much depreciated, and there was some other remarkable cheap sales that were made in Confederate money, but I am satisfied (though I am not speaking of any sale I now remember) that it depreciated fully one-half. The negro property had depreciated two-thirds. And then provisions were cheap.

Q. 34. Tobacco and cotton and things of that sort?

A. I would say the whole shebang averaged 50 per cent, with some exceptions.

Q. 35. In actual value?

A. In gold, yes, sir.

Q. 36. What was the condition of the highways, roadways and turnpikes in the State in 1863—2 years after the beginning of the War?

A. I don't know very much about the turnpikes. I wouldn't say the country roads were very bad because there was so little travel on them. But the railroads, well they just got worse and worse. To give you some idea. From Richmond to Petersburg after the War—21 miles—the schedule time after the War was 2 hours. It took 2 hours as a general thing to go 21 miles.

Q. 37. What was the condition of the railroads in the Spring of 1863—as to the equipment, track and roadbed?

A. Bad.

Q. 38. How were other lines of communication, for instance, 1055 the water lines, canals and rivers—was satisfactory service furnished by steamship lines?

A. There wasn't any. They stopped running steamboats on the James River in 1861. In 1861 they didn't run them down any further than Jamestown.

Q. 39. How about the Rappahannock?

A. I don't know anything about that. In January, 1863, I wouldn't say that any steamboats were run at all so far as James River is concerned.

Q. 40. Is your estimate of the depreciation in values of real and personal property in the present State of Virginia being as great as at least 50 per cent. in June, 1863, confined to the portion of the territory of Virginia then within the Confederate lines, or do you include the whole State?

A. I have no knowledge on which I could form an estimate of the property in that part of the State in the Yankee lines. I have no knowledge of that at all.

Q. 41. Is your estimate then confined to the territory inside of the Confederate lines in 1863?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 42. Do you take in account then the destruction of fences, property, and the carrying off of property inside of the Federal lines?

A. I don't think the fences were hurt much except where the army went by (you are trying to find about 1863 now)—I don't say that the fences had depreciated very much except where the armies went by. You know they took everything as they went along. They camped near the west end of the town here and burnt all the woods.

Q. 43. In what currency were taxes paid in 1863? 1056

A. Confederate money.

Q. 44. In Confederate money?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 45. With reference to what currency was personal property valued for taxation in 1863?

A. I don't know.

Q. 46. Do you remember anything as to the assessments of personal property?

A. No, sir.

Q. 47. You only know that the taxes were paid in Confederate money?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 48. And that Confederate money was the currency of Virginia at that time?

A. Yes, sir. Of course there were a few exceptions where a man sold his property for other things. They swapped farms and things for something else.

Q. 49. They bartered?

A. Bartered, yes, sir.

Q. 50. What was the condition of wagons and farming implements at that time?

A. They must have been very bad.

Q. 51. What is your age, Colonel?

A. 78 years of age.

Note: The State of West Virginia, by her Attorney 1057
General, objects to each and all of the foregoing questions and answers, because they are not relevant and germane to the issues in this cause, and for other reasons apparent in said questions and answers; and without waiving said objection, proceeds to cross examine the witness.

Cross Examination.

By the Attorney General of West Virginia.

XQ. 1. Colonel, do you remember the assessed valuation of horses in 1863?

A. No, sir.

XQ. 2. What is your best recollection?

A. Well, I would say that they probably sold better than anything else, because they were more in demand. If I had been the assessor I would have assessed them higher because there was more demand for them.

XQ. 3. In 1863 what would an ordinary horse sell for in Confederate money?

A. I couldn't form any idea of that at all.

XQ. 4. What would a slave sell for in Confederate money at that time?

A. I bought this slave for $2,000.00 in Confederate money. Money was selling at from 9 to 10 for 1, which I estimated to be about $225.00 in gold.

XQ. 5. The value of other personal property was about the same ratio, was it not?

A. No, I think negroes were as much or more depreciated than anything else.

XQ. 6. Well, then, if you had a horse valued at $200.00 1058 in gold, it would sell for more $1,200.00 in Confederate money?

A. In June, just about $1,200.00. I don't know anything, not even a horse, that sold as high in 1863 as it did before the War. In other words, everything was being depressed. No business was being done. The cities issued these shinplasters to support the poor people, and then they repudiated them all afterwards—all except the City of Petersburg, where I was born.

XQ. 7. Wasn't there more demand for horses in 1863 than there was before the War?

A. Of course there was. Everything was low. The idea of flour selling at $3.00 a barrel, but afterwards it went up higher and higher, and finally you couldn't get it at any price. We were starving here in 1863, you know. A great deal of the country was occupied by the Yankee Army, and we couldn't get our supplies. The first thing that General Grant did was to cut off the Southern route, and we only had one road left, and that was this road from here to Danville.

Signature of witness waived by consent.

MAJOR PHILIP A. WELLFORD,
being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

By the Attorney General of Virginia:

Q. 1. What is your place of residence, Major?

A. Richmond, Virginia. 1059

Q. 2. Where were you born and raised?

A. Fredericksburg, Virginia, and moved to Richmond about 1857.

Q. 3. What is your age, Major Wellford?

A. 75.

Q. 4. Please state where you were during the War of 1861-65, and what position, if any, you held in connection with the Confederate army?

A. I left Richmond as a Lieutenant in the first company that left the City of Richmond, and was sent to Acquia Creek, on the Potomac, first, where we were about two months. We then came down to Richmond, and after being here for a short we went out to West Virginia to meet Garnett and Pegram. From there we went out to Valley Mountain, where General Lee came to take control, and we were there during that summer. In the fall we came back, and in January, 1862, we marched up to Winchester to join General Jackson, and I was then with him until after he was killed, and the Army was brought back to Mine Run. I was in both campaigns across the Potomac. In 1863 I was brought from the Army and put in charge of the mills here, running them exclusively for the Confederate government, where I remained until the evacuation. At the reorganization of the Army in 1862 I went on General Taliaferro's Staff, and as there was some question about having volunteer aides, I was made Commissary in the 23rd Virginia Regiment, then afterwards was Assistant Commissary in Taliaferro's Brigade.

Q. 5. Did you go through the portions of Virginia through which the command of General Stonewall Jackson marched in 1060 1862 and 1863?

A. Yes, sir, up in the Valley, out to Romney, over into Maryland, back to Fredericksburg, all along there.

Q. 6. You were encamped during the winter of 1862-63 in Fredericksburg?

A. Yes, a few miles below there.

Q. 7. The Confederate Army camped on one side of the Rappahannock and the Federal Army on the other side during the winter of 1862-63, did it not?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 8. Were you with General Jackson's corps when it came to Richmond just before the seven days' fight?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 9. Were you with his command when it went from Richmond to Orange County in the summer of 1862, and at the battle of Slaughter's Mountain?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 10. Were you with it in the campaign ending in the second battle of Manassas?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 11. And you were with it on its return from Maryland after the battle of Sharpsburg?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 12. Then in the winter of 1862-63 you were with that Army near Fredericksburg?

Q. 13. Did you accompany that Army in the summer of 1863 1061 after the battle of Chancellorsville, when it marched to Gettysburg?

A. Yes, sir, and on its return to Mine Run.

Q. 14. Please state, Major Wellford, what was the condition of the farms and houses, buildings, fences and orchards in the portion of Virginia which came under your observation, and within your knowledge at that time, during the period to which your testimony refers.

A. Well, they were almost desolated. When I returned from West Virginia the first time and went down the Valley it was a perfect garden spot—all the farms were occupied with everything you could think of. A few years afterwards those farms were in a bad condition, nothing had been done towards the fences, or on the buildings. They had no cattle, no horses, nor anything else.

Q. 15. What was the case in Northern Virginia—the region north of Richmond and the Rappahannock through which you marched in 1863?

A. I didn't go on the north side of the Rappahannock because it was occupied by the Federal Army, but knew that whole country well, having been born and raised in Fredericksburg, and it was completely desolated. Nearly all the woods between the Rappahannock and the Potomac were cut down, all the fences destroyed, all the roads ruined, and all of the country south of the Rappahannock that was occupied by General Lee's Army was very much in the same way. I know when we were camped below Fredericksburg at Stringer's Neck, we didn't follow the roads at all. We had new roads cut right across the fields.

Q. 16. Why were those roads abandoned? 1062

A. Well, the roads were in a terrible condition. Nothing had been done to them, and the wagons were turned out of the road into the fields, and I have seen places there where the roads were one-quarter of a mile wide, made so by the wagons turning out farther and farther trying to get on good ground. And from Gordonsville up to Manassas things were not much better.

Q. 17. How was it in Prince William County and Fairfax that you had to march through in going to Sharpsburg?

A. I didn't go through them, except part of Fairfax.

Q. 18. What was the condition of the railroads in Virginia in 1863?

A. As bad as they could be.

Q. 19. As to their equipment, track and roadbeds?

A. Well, their equipment, you may say the passenger cars were almost entirely done away with. Almost all of the hauling of soldiers and everything was done in box cars. Trains moved very slowly, very irregularly—rates not over ten to fifteen miles an hour.

. 20. What taxes were levied by the government at that time upon the farms?

A. I really can't say about that. I knew nothing about the taxes until I was brought here and put in charge of the mills. The only tax then that I had anything to do with was the tax in kind.

Q. 21. What was that tax in kind?

A. All the farmers had to send in 10% of their crop of wheat and corn.

Q. 22. One-tenth of the gross products of the farm? 1063

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 23. That was exacted by the government?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 24. Was that in addition to the money tax levied by the State?

A. I think so; yes, sir.

Q. 25. As a result of the causes which you have mentioned, what was the value of the lands in Virginia in June, 1863—the actual value with reference to sound hard money?

A. That is a very hard question to answer. The value of lands had depreciated so much that nobody sold any land unless they were absolutely obliged to. When they were forced to sell, they took the best price they could get. I was not in the real estate business, but I know of the sale of some farms. The Moss Neck farm belonging to a relative of mine, Mr. Corbin, was offered to me in the fall of 1863 for $100,000.00 in Confederate money.

Q. 26. What was that farm worth before the War, Major Wellford?

A. Well, I should say from $40,000.00 to $60,000.00. There had been a house built on it within 3 or 4 years that I know cost $30,000.00. There was another farm belonging to another relative of mine, Dr. William Wellford, that was sold for $100,000.00 in Confederate bonds.

Q. 27. How much was that farm worth before the War?

A. I suppose before the War it was worth $50,000.00 to $60,000.00.

Q. 28. What were the Confederate bonds worth with reference to gold and silver? 1064

A. I don't remember. Then I had a mill near Fredericksburg which I sold in 62 for little over one-half as much as I thought it was worth before the War. I didn't own the mill entirely—I owned one-fourth of it.

Q. 29. You say there had been a great depreciation in the value of real estate. What, as a minimum, would you say was that depreciation in June, 1863, as compared with January, 1861?

A. Well, if you would reduce that Confederate money to gold and compare it with the value before the War, I would say that it wasn't over one-half.

Q. 30. Now this Moss Neck farm that you say was offered to you in the fall of 1863 for $100,000.00 in Confederate money—do you know what the value of Confederate money was at that time?

A. It must have been somewhere from 15 to 20 for 1.

Q. 31. So that it must have been worth then not over $7,000.00 in good money?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 32. How was it with personal property—had there been any increase or diminution of the quantity of personal property?

A. Yes, sir, an immense diminution in the quantity.

Q. 33. Had there been an increase or diminution in the value of specific personal property as a rule with reference to good money, I mean?

A. It depends upon what kind of personal property you mean. Hogs, if you made them into bacon, would have brought more. Horses, where in the neighborhod of the army, should 1065 you meet one of those dismounted cavalrymen, would bring most any price. You could get all the money he had for a horse. This had very little reference to the price before the war.

Q. 34. As a rule a dismounted cavalryman was not very well supplied with money, was he?

A. No, sir.

Q. 35. How was it with tobacco and cotton, and with negro slaves, as to their value taking good money as a standard of value?

A. I do not know of any direct transactions, but I know the impression that I had after I was brought back to Richmond and living here, was that slaves didn't bring one-half or very little more one-fourth, of what they would have brought before the war.

Q. 36. Lincoln's Proclamation emancipating the slaves was issued in September, 1862, to take effect according to its terms within such portions of the Confederate States as had not then laid down their arms and returned their allegiance to the National Government, on the first day of January, 1863, what effect did that have?

A. Very little until the surrender of Vicksburg and Gettysburg. It was laughed at and ridiculed by most of the people. But after Vicksburg and Gettysburg, we began to be a little doubtful.

Q. 37. Taking all the movable personal property, live-stock, farming utensils, vehicles of every kind, household and kitchen furniture, the stores of tobacco and corn, what would you say, as a minimum, was the depreciated of all personal property in 1066

Virginia in June, 1863, as compared with January, 1861?

A. Leaving out cotton and tobacco, I would say that it was nearly 75%. Carriages and wagons were almost all worn out; broken down. All farming utensils were pretty well worn out. There was very little demand for them. Men did not cultivate more than one-half or two-thirds of the acreage that he had done before. They had no new implements, and all the carriages and farming utensils were almost worn out.

Q. 38. How did the conditions then existing affect the agricultural business of the State as to its profitableness?

A. I was more familiar with the crops along the James River and this section around Richmond, and that down in North Carolina, and I don't suppose that the crops made in 1863 were on the whole more than one-half of what they had been years before. I know that was certainly the case with wheat. I was brought down in September, 1863, and put in charge of these mills. The grain wheat was brought to the mill and it was ground, and we paid the owners of the mill a percentage for grinding it. The balance went to the Confederate government. Very soon after I came I was called on for an estimate of what I thought the wheat crop in Virginia was, and how long it would last, and I remember I made up an estimate that at the then amount of requisitions, the wheat crop would not last until the 15th of December of that year, and that 1067 other means of providing for the men would have to be resorted to. We then went to work and from that time on to the close of the War, the Confederate Army was fed on corn meal ground from corn brought from Southwest Georgia. Sometimes the trains wouldn't come in here until during the night, and I would grind it up during the night and it was issued to the Army for breakfast in the morning. Sometimes it didn't come in and I would have to go around to the Quartermaster's for corn and get him to let me have it. As a matter of fact, from September, 1863, to the end of the War, I never had three days supply of breadstuff on hand at any time for the Army.

Q. 39. Were you in charge of that branch of the Commissary Department at that time?

A. Of the breadstuffs that were used by the Army and hospitals.

Q. 40. What would you say, as a minimum, was the depreciation of all the personal property in Virginia, in June, 1863, upon the basis of any sort of sound money? What was the per cent. of the depreciation in June, 1863, as compared with January, 1861?

A. Not less than 50%. There had been no repairs made to furniture. All the mechanics were in the Army. If a bed broke down, a man had to fix it the best way he could. The same way with all the farming utensils and everything else.

Q. 41. In that estimate do you take any account of the waste, destruction, and consumption of livestock and other personal property in the portions of Virginia ravaged by the two armies?

A. I suppose by 1863 nearly one-half of the horses that were 1068 in Virginia had been killed—were used up or died in the Army. The same is true as to beef cattle, and as I say, all the other farming utensils, furniture, household effects, and everything of that sort, had deteriorated without any repairs being done.

Q. 42. Can you speak as to the value of securities, the stocks of insurance companies, manufacturing companies, and of banks and other stocks?

A. They had depreciated. I bought, I remember, $5,000.00 $50 shares of the Farmer's Bank stock, and I don't think I paid over $200.00 for it in Confederate money.

Q. 43. What was that the equivalent of in good money at that time?

A. Not more than $30.00 a share.

Q. 44. What would that stock have been worth before the War?

A. Mr. Taylor can tell better.

Q. 45. Do you remember the dividends that were regularly paid upon it before War?

A. Never less than 6%.

Q. 46. In what currency were taxes paid in June, 1862?

A. In Confederate money.

Q. 47. What was the sole measure of values at that time in transactions between the government and the people, and between man and man?

A. In Confederate money, except when there was a barter. 1069

Q. 48. How was gold and silver disposed of at that time?

A. Some of the brokers here had some gold that they would sell.

Q. 49. Was gold sold as a commodity just as any other commodity?

A. Yes, sir. No one called for gold unless they wanted to get across the lines.

Q. 50. From your observation and knowledge at that time, what was the condition of the people of Virginia in the territory now constituting the Commonwealth of Virginia—their financial condition?

A. A large proportion was abject poverty.

Note.—The State of West Virginia, by her Attorney-General, objects to each and all of the foregoing questions and answers, because they are not relevant or germane to the issues in this cause, and for other reasons apparent in said questions and answers; and without waiving said exception, proceeds to cross examine Major Philip A. Wellford.

Cross Examination.

By the Attorney-General of West Virginia:

XQ. 1. In June, 1860, or during the assessment month of 1863, what was the value of horses, cows, hogs, etc., in Confederate money? 1070

A. I can't give any reliable answer to that. I was in the Army at the time that assessment was made.

XQ. 2. Don't you know what horses sold for in Confederate money at that time?

A. Well, as I said a little while ago, it depended upon the necessity. I bought in April or May a very fine horse, a little old—I gave $300.00 in Confederate money for it. I bought it from a person who was anxious to sell.

XQ. 3. From your information as to what other people said as to the value of horses and cattle, what would you say was the value in Confederate money?

A. In the Army we didn't bother ourselves much about the price of anything outside of just what we wanted right then and there.

XQ. 4. Did you have any experience as to the value of them when you were here in charge of the mills?

A. Very little.

XQ. 5. When did you first come here to take charge of the mills?

A. It was in September, 1863. It was just two or three days before the battle of Mine Run. I will say that all the teams for the mill were bought by the owners of the mill.

XQ. 5. When did you first start to use Confederate money?

A. Very soon after the War commenced. The first payment that I received in Confederate money as a soldier was at Valley Mountain in August, 1861. 1071

Redirect Examination.

By the Attorney-General of Virginia:

Q. 1. State any experience that you had in your official capacity in regard to any transactions during the War which would have any bearing upon this investigation.

A. As evidence of how complete the country was stripped of everything, I will say that in the Army I very frequently was sent off to try to beg, borrow, buy, and impress provisions for the Brigade, and I very rarely succeeded in getting any. Then on two occasions while I was here in Richmond the railroads were cut and the provisions come from the South were interrupted, and I was sent on horseback up along the James River & Kanawha Canal to see all the farmers to tell them the situation we were in in Richmond, and to beg, borrow, buy, or impress any meat or corn, and I got very little. The whole country was completely stripped.

Note.—The State of West Virginia, by her Attorney-General, objects to each and all of the foregoing questions and answers, because they are not relevant or germane to the issues in this cause, and for other reasons apparent in said questions and answers; and without waiving said exception, proceeds to re-cross examine Major Philip A. Wellford.

Re-Cross Examination. 1072

By the Attorney-General of West Virginia:

Q. 1. In purchasing this corn and meat, in what currency was it paid for?

A. Confederate money.

Q. 2. What was the value of the corn and meat?

A. The government had a scale of prices that it fixed, and I wasn't authorized to go beyond that. If they didn't take that price I impressed it.

Q. 3. What was that scale?

A. I forget now. Flour I know was $37.50 a barrel. It was readily sold on the streets here in Richmond for from $75.00 to $100.00 a barrel.

Q. 4. How about your meat?

A. I really forget what the meat was.

Q. 5. Did you purchase any live-stock?

A. No, sir.

By Mr. Moon:

Q. You didn't have charge of the meat department?

A. No, sir. I was just sent out to ask the farmers to help us, and I took it forcibly if they didn't sell at the price fixed.

The signature of the witness is waived by consent.

MR. WILLIAM G. TAYLOR, 1073

being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

By Mr. John B. Moon:

Q. 1. What is your age, Mr. Taylor?

A. 73 in March.

Q. 2. Where were you during the War from 1861 to 1865?

A. Most of the time in and around Richmond.

Q. 3. What business and occupation were you in—what was your occupation at that time?

A. In the early part of the War I was connected with a bank—had charge of the Traders Bank at Richmond, and up to the latter part of the year 1862 I had charge of the effects of the bank, that is carried on the business here and then carried the effects away when the raids were made around Richmond where there was supposed to be any danger. In the latter part of 1862 I associated myself with Mr. Isaacs in the broker's business, under the firm of Williams, Isaacs & Company, and afterwards Isaacs, Taylor & Williams.

Q. 4. Did you have any other occupation?

A. Yes, sir. Then I became subject to the orders of the Secretary of War and General Lee as a scout to follow up these raids around Richmond.

Q. 5. You were connected with the Confederate Army?

A. I was connected with it in that way, but not in any official capacity. They would call on me and I would go for a week at a time, and then I was called upon at times to aid them in the Treasury department. They were converting gold into Confederate money—the gold that they would borrow from banks—a 1074 good deal of the time I was taken there. So in all I was rather in an anonymous position—first in the Army, then at my office, and then there. And when there was a raid around Richmond—a fight around Richmond—I would go to the front, and my time was pretty much occupied in that way.

Q. 6. What was the currency used in what is now the State of Virginia—in the Confederate lines—in 1863 what kind of money was used?

A. Confederate money.

Q. 7. Any other kind of money?

A. None at all except these little shinplasters used as change.

Q. 8. They went as Confederate money?

A. Yes, sir. These market men would use them sometimes. They didn't go outside of the State.

Q. 9. They were payable in Confederate money?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 10. Was that the only kind of money used in dealings between man and man?

A. Yes, sir, except the City of Richmond issued notes payable in Confederate money and receivable in taxes.

Q. 11. In what kind of money were taxes assessed and paid at that time—in 1863?

A. Confederate money. These things that I speak of would not be received in payment of taxes—I mean these little shinplasters. The treasury department would not receive anything except Confederate money, nor would the banks. They were just sim- 1075 ply used for the purpose of convenience. Sometimes these large foundries issued tickets for the time being instead of paying currency. A little due bill or something of that sort for the purpose of making change, there being no gold or silver in circulation.

Q. 12. Will you state whether there was an increase or diminution in the actual value of the personal property in what is now the State of Virginia, between January 1, 1861, and June, 1863, and if so, what it was?

A. Well, I suppose the depreciation was 50% to 75 per cent. on personal property generally, except such things as were absolutely in demand, like horses and provisions, and things that you would have to have. In other words, you could take $1.00 in gold and buy two or three times as much by converting it into Confederate money as you could prior to the War.

Q. 13. What was the value of land in June, 1863, as compared with what it was worth in January, 1861?

A. Well, my impression was this in regard to that—I thought that land was the cheapest thing on the market, and had often thought about investing, but the question in my mind was in buying it whether I would have anything after the War, whether that would not be confiscated—that had some weight with me. If I purchased it, whether it would not be taken from me afterwards. Lands were very cheap—real estate as compared to what it was before the War.

Q. 14. What would you say was the percentage of diminution in value?

A. I can't say, except that I recollect one or two pieces of 1076 property that were sold. As to the date I can't tell you. Now, I remember one little piece of property fronting my place where I reside now. This Irishman came in. I was in the broker's business, buying and selling gold and silver. My recollection is that he had $60.00 in silver—certainly not over $70.00. He asked me to know whether I would advise him to sell it or not. Seemed to come to me as a friend. I asked him if he owned a residence. He said no, but there was a place he would like to own. He told me what he could get it for. I found out that this amount of money that he had, converted into Confederate money, would buy it, and I advised him to buy the property; that I would give him enough money for that to buy this property. They own that property to-day. I suppose that property ought to have been worth $500.00 in good times before the War—the land and the house. I think the property would have been cheap at that. It was just out of town here, and I think it contained about two acres. It looks about the size of a square in town; but that, of course, may have been just an individual case. I do not say that everything had depreciated in that territory. Then I remember Mr. Haxsall selling a piece of property up here on Franklin Street. My recollection is that he got $40,000.00 for it in Confederate money.

Q. 15. What house was it?

A. That brown stone house on Franklin Street. I suppose it is worth that much now in good money. I suppose it cost him that much. 1077

Q. 16. What Haxsall was that?

A. I think William Henry Haxsall. A year or two afterwards he bought it back again, and had to advance $10,000.00, I think, to get off from buying it. I don't say positively that those were the figures. Just what I heard. I thought then he was making a mistake.

Q. 17. What, on the whole, would you say was the percentage of depreciation in value between January, 1861, and June, 1863—in real estate?

A. It looks to me like it was certainly 50% or 60 per cent. Of course, this is my impression. I can't remember those things accurately. I am only stating from recollection now, just what I heard. I have never talked with Mr. Haxsall about it.

There was no cross examination.

Present on behalf of the State of West Virginia: William G. Conley, Attorney-General of West Virginia.

MR. S. H. HAWES, 1079
being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

By the Attorney-General of Virginia:

Q. 1. Please state your age, residence and occupation.

A. I am 71 years old, merchant and reside in Richmond, Virginia.

Q. 2. Where were you and how were you occupied during the War from 1861 to 1865?

A. I enlisted in the Confederate Army on the 19th day of April, 1861, and served in that Army during the whole War.

Q. 3. In what parts of Virginia did you serve?

A. The first of the War I was on the Lower Peninsula—between the James and the York—under Magruder, and the second year in the battles around Richmond, and then in the Valley.

Q. 4. Where did you serve in the summer and fall of 1862, and the spring, summer and fall of 1863?

A. In the summer and fall of 1862 in the Valley of Virginia, in 1863 we scouted and fought from here to Gettysburg, all through Culpepper, near the Town of Winchester.

Q. 5. In what counties?

A. In Culpepper, Orange, Rockbridge, all through those counties. I don't remember the names.

Q. 6. Were you in the counties of Fauquier, Prince William, Fairfax, Alexander, Loudoun, or any of them, during the fall of 1862—that is during the campaign of General Lee and General Jackson against Pope?

A. Yes, sir, I was all through those counties. 1080

Q. 7. In the campaign in the spring of May and June, 1863, did you march with General Lee's Army from the neighborhood of Fredericksburg after the battle of Chancellorsville, through Northern Virginia to Gettysburg?

A. Yes, sir. I have a diary giving the whole march. I took some notes from it last night, showing some places we went by up to the fight of Gettysburg.

Q. 8. In going to and returning from Gettysburg, did you pass through the counties of Spotsylvania, Orange, Culpeper, Fauquier, Warren, Clarke, and Frederick, or any of them?

A. I did, all of those you speak of.

Q. 9. Do you remember whether you were in Prince William and Fairfax counties upon that campaign?

A. I can't remember exactly. I wouldn't like to say. As we moved about so rapidly, I hardly knew where we were.

Q. 10. How long were you camped about Richmond prior to June, 1863?

A. I can't tell you exactly, but we were here some time. After the retreat from Williamsburg we camped around Richmond a while.

Q. 11. Please state what, within your observation and knowledge, was the condition in which the farms, forests, buildings, &c., in the regions occupied by the Federal and Confederate Armies, were left by those Armies?

A. Well, the conditions were most deplorable. I have seen hundreds of acres of splendid wood land cut down while the Armies were there, and left bare of timber. All the fences in 1081 the neighborhood were burned and the whole country ravaged. It was distressing to see it. What one Army didn't take another did.

Q. 12. What was the effect of the occupation of any portion of the country by either Army in respect to live-stock, poultry, as well as growing crops?

A. Everything was swept off. The farmers tried to hide their horses when the Army would come there, but somebody would report them and they nearly always lost their horses. The fields were pretty well swept of all forage. I know there was no respect for the farmer. I judge by what we did with our artillery horses. Whenever we found forage, we would turn our horses in, and the other Army did the same thing. Had to do it.

Q. 13. Turned their horses in on the growing crops?

A. Yes, sir—well, I will take that back—turned them in on the timothy fields and clover fields. I don't know that I ever saw any one turn them in on the growing crops, but there were not many growing crops to turn them on. In those counties that you speak of growing crops were a rarity.

Q. 14. What was the condition of the highways and highway bridges in the fall of 1862 and during the first half of 1863?

A. The highways in Virginia at best were bad, but they were terrible at that time, because two Armies were passing over them. You may say they were impassable in the Winter. I have been in the mud myself up to my knees, trying to force the artillery through. 1082

Q. 15. What command did you serve in?

A. I served in the First Regiment of Virginia Artillery.

Q. 16. What position did you hold?

A. Lieutenant.

Q. 17. Lieutenant in an Artillery company?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 18. What was the condition of the railroads—as to their equipment, track, and roadbed—their capacity for efficiently moving crops or products of any kind?

A. Very poor. We rarely went over 12 miles an hour at full speed.

Q. 19. Is that as to passenger trains?

A. As to the trains I was on. The men would jokingly say that they could jump off and pick blackberries and catch up with the train.

Q. 20. What was the condition of the buildings through the country?

A. Very dilapidated. No one could keep them in order.

Q. 21. What as to vehicles and farming utensils?

A. All of our people were in the War. It was home-made work and very poor. They were in bad condition. Sorry to report that, but they were.

Q. 22. To what extent were the people able to keep their buildings and utensils and vehicles in repair?

A. You know the fighting men were all in the war, and nearly all of those left at home were men of advanced years, and they were not able to look after things as they should. 1083

Q. 23. How was it as to household furniture, household effects?

A. Of course those things go to wreck when they are not repaired and they did go to wreck.

Q. 24. What in 1863 was the currency in use in the territory of the present State of Virginia—what was the measure of all values, the currency in which taxes were paid, and with reference to which all transactions were had?

A. Confederate money.

Q. 25. From your knowledge and observation, would you be prepared to state what, as a minimum, was the depreciation of the real and personal property in Virginia, occasioned by the causes to which you have referred as to June, 1863?

A. I should say about 50 per cent.

Q. 26. You would state that as a minimum?

A. Yes, sir, I think so, from my observation and knowledge of properties that were sold belonging to my own connections.

Q. 27. When I speak of the depreciation in value, I mean in actual value, taking any sound money as a standard, estimating the property of Virginia in June, 1863, and contrasting it with its value at any time prior to April, 1861—in either 1860 or 1861—what would be your estimate as to the depreciation, as a minimum—the lowest estimate that could be fairly made, of this depreciation?

A. Of course, I can't say positively, but I think what I said just now—about 50 per cent.—would cover it.

Q. 28. Is that your estimate of the depreciation of specific 1084 property then in Virginia?

A. I can't exactly understand what you mean. From my observation though, and from what I know that property sold for prior to the War, and what it sold for during the War, I think it was about 50 per cent. as well as I can remember. I heard my father speak of it. I didn't sell any myself.

Q. 29. Can you state approximately what proportion of the movable personal property in the State had been destroyed, carried off by the Armies, or consumed, in June, 1863, as compared with, say, April, 1861—as a minimum?

A. I would not like to make that estimate. I couldn't tell. I want to be as accurate as I can. Everything was in a very deplorable state, and the damage to property had been terrible. In fact, some farms had been destroyed—nothing left. Some had little. So I can't tell exactly. I wouldn't like to make any estimate.

Q. 30. Was the portion of the live-stock and personal property upon the farms in the State which were carried off, destroyed, or consumed, large or small?

A. Large. No question about that.

Note.—The state of West Virginia, by her Attorney-General, objects to each and all of the foregoing questions and the answers thereto, because the same are not responsive to the order of reference in this cause, and for other reasons apparent on the face of said questions and answers; and without waiving said objections, proceeds to cross examine the witness.

Cross Examination. 1085

By the Attorney-General of West Virginia:

XQ. 1. Mr. Hawes, did you know the value of horses during the years 1862 and 1863 in Confederate money?

A. It varied very much, Mr. Conley, according to the horse; some of them $400.00, some of them $1,000.00, and some of them $1,500.00.

XQ. 2. Do you know the value of cattle during the same period?

A. No, sir.

XQ. 3. Hogs?

A. No, sir, only horses, because I had to deal with them.

XQ. 4. Do you know how much horses were assessed at during these years—on an average?

A. When an officer's horse was killed in battle, there was a board of appraisement, and according to the value of the horse he was allowed for him.

XQ. 5. I have reference, however, to the assessment made by the assessors of personal property in the various counties throughout the State of Virginia?

A. Oh, no. I don't know anything about taxes during that year. I was in the army all during the War. I don't know anything about taxes.

XQ. 6. What would you say would be the value of those horses in gold during the years 1862 and 1863?

A. I knew nothing about gold at that time. All I knew about was Confederate money. 1086

XQ. 7. Was Dinwiddie County an average county of this State during that period, as to property, according to your best judgment?

A. Dinwiddie county wasn't damaged as much as the other counties, from my point of view, during the War, because the Armies didn't fight over there as they did in the others.

XQ. 8. I note from the original assessment list of Dinwiddie County for the year 1863, that the total number of horses, mules, asses, and genets were 2,202, and that the total assessed value thereof was $211,290.00. I would like for you to state what the average assessment was for that county for the year 1863?

A. I don't know anything about the assessment of property there. I only speak of my knowledge of what happened to me during the War. It is a matter of fact, however, that I don't understand the assessments in the counties. Assessments in the counties are very remarkable things. How in the world they can have the conscience to put things down so low, has always been a mystery to me. I might say the same of personal property in the cities; but I know very well that they never assess things in the counties at the proper value. I know that.

XQ. 9. I hand you the original assessment list for that county for the year 1863 to verify the figures I have given you.

A. I haven't any doubt about that. I don't think they know what they are doing when they assessed them. Somebody must know, but I don't understand it. 1087

XQ. 10. Now, Mr. Hawes, isn't it a fact that the average assessment for that year in that county was, in round numbers, $95 a head?

A. You mean according to these figures. It looks that way.

XQ. 11. To be exact $95.95.

A. It looks like about $100.00 in round numbers. I know nothing in world about that. The mode of assessment in counties is past finding out for an ordinary layman.

XQ. 12. In the same county, and for the same year, there was assessed 6,662 cattle at a total assessed valuation of $92,441.00?

A. Well, as I told you a while ago, when you asked me about cattle, I know nothing about cattle—whether that assessment is right or wrong.

XQ. 13. It would average about $13.87 a head, would it not, according to the figures I have given you as shown by the original book of asessment?

A. I don't know anything about the value of cattle, if you ask me to say whether I think that is a proper valuation or not. I know nothing in the world about it.

Redirect Examination.

By the Attorney-General of Virginia:

Q. 1. That assessment referred to in the question just propounded to you embraces all the cattle and all the horses in Dinwiddie County—good, bad and indifferent—colts, and old broken down horses, as well as any good horses that might have been left in the county, and so far as to the cattle, it embraces evidently all of the cattle in the county, including calves, old cows—as a rule can you say whether much of the best stock was left on the farms—whether the best horses and the best cattle, and all of the beef cattle generally, were not carried off or consumed? 1087½

A. They were taken off, no doubt about that.

Note.—The State of West Virginia, by her Attorney-General, objects to each and all of the foregoing questions and answers thereto, because the same are not responsive to the order of reference in this cause, and for other reasons apparent on the face of said questions and answers; and without waiving said objections, proceeds to recross-examine the witness.

Recross Examination.

By the Attorney-General of West Virginia:

XQ. 1. I will ask you to take the original assessment list for Dinwiddie County and look in Column "42 under the head of the number of horses, &c., together with the assessed value, immediately following, and say whether the average in the columns you examine is below $100.00, and what the highest assessment of any one animal is, together with the lowest assessment of any one animal?

A. Mr. Conley, I told you just now that the assessed values in counties was past my understanding, and I know they are usually wrong; and yet why they allow them to assess that way I do not understand. This is, it seems to me, a mighty low assessment for horses. They nearly always do assess them low. Now, here are two horses at $50, and yet they may have been very poor in 1863. I expect it was miserable stock that those farmers had, because the best horses were taken by the cavalry and artillery for the War, and the rest that were left were very shaky, I expect; but giving them the benefit of the doubt, I would say that the assessment is fair, but I know nothing about that. Here are four for $150 each. There are three items of horses at $150 each. They may 1088 have been young horses. It is all guess work. I don't know anything about that.

XQ. 2. The assessments made at all times take in the good, bad, and indifferent, do they not?

A. Are supposed to, yes, sir.

Signature of the witness is waived by consent.

MR. CHARLES U. WILLIAMS, 1089
being duly sworn, deposes and says, as follows:

By Mr. John B. Moon:

Q. 1. Mr. Williams, what is your age, residence and occupation?

A. I am nearly 59 years old, and my occupation now is a farmer. I have been a lawyer for 41 years, and I have resided in Richmond all my life—within a mile of it. Now I am about 5 miles out, but I hardly consider that my permanent residence. I still have a town house that I rent out while living in the country.

Q. 2. Where were you and what were you engaged in during the War from 1861 to 1865?

A. I went to Harpers Ferry on the 17th of April. I belonged to a battalion of students at the University of Virginia. We went to Harpers Ferry. Took a train to Manassas and then down to Strasburg, and marched from Strasburg to Winchester, thence by rail. After about ten days Governor Letcher ordered us back to the University and refused to permit us to be mustered in as a battalion, and we disbanded at Harpers Ferry, and I went to Winchester and staid for a day or two with a cousin of mine, Phil Williams, and then he drove me in his buggy to Staunton, and then I came back to Richmond. I then went into Richmond Howitzers, and went to Yorktown. I was engaged in drilling artillery during my whole stay at Yorktown. I staid there until the 10th day of February following—1862. I was then ordered to Richmond and assigned as drill master of artillery at the camp out here, and remained there until July. I then, was appointed on the Staff of Major-General 1090
Leigh R. Jones in 1862, and went with him through the first Maryland campaign. I marched from Richmond all the way to Gordonsville, acting as Adjutant for the artillery battalion—was temporarily assigned to that—and after that marched with the Army to overtake Jackson, and went through Northern Virginia into Maryland. I came back from Maryland and staid a couple of days with Mr. Phil Williams in Winchester, and I rode in a stage from there to Staunton, and then came to Richmond; I came as special messenger to Mrs. Jones to inform her that her husband had been retired from the Army on account of a probably fatal trouble with his heart. This was in December, 1862, and he died in January, 1863. I went back to the Army after I had found that his death was inevitable. I had done the work that he wanted me to do. He was in bed and I went there every morning and spent several hours writing for him. I returned to the Army about the last week in December, 1862, and went on the Staff of General Corps of Pickett's Division, and remained with him until the close of the War, the last year of which I was his Assistant Adjutant and Inspector General.

Q. 3. This was all in the present State of Virginia except when you went into Maryland?

A. Yes, sir. We crossed at Shepherdstown in returning from Maryland, marched through Martinsburg, and then we came down by way of Bunker Hill.

Q. 4. What was the state of the country and what was the effect upon the country of the occupation by the army and of the existence of the war, in regard to improvements on lands, 1091 and the cultivation of lands, and the condition of personal property on the lands—stock or other personalty?

A. There was a constant state of depreciation. When I was in the valley in April, 1861, it was the garden spot of the earth. Every thing was beautiful, well tilled, and as well cultivated as could be. It was full of fine crops and fine stock. My next trip through the valley was in September, 1862, and the depreciation was very marked in every respect.

Q. 5. Taking the whole of the present State of Virginia what portion of deterioration, in your judgment, was there in actual value of the lands, from January 1, 1861, to June, 1863? What percentage of actual depreciation in the value of lands?

A. Well, the Confederate money at the beginning of the war was practically as good as greenbacks. By 1863 they had become very much depreciated, and the Confederate Government cut off 33⅓ per cent of its treasury notes, thinking, thereby, to enhance the value of the rest, but which had a much more natural effect of rendering the rest almost valueless. The 66⅔, instead of being worth as much as the old currency had been at par, was less than the 66⅔ before it was cut off, and the depreciation was much more rapid from that time on. But the value of land depends upon the employment of personal property upon it, and the personal property was scattered. The horses had been taken, the cattle had been eaten up, and the negroes were, many of them, working on public works. They were carried from Orange and Culpeper counties down to 1092 the Peninsula to throw up the fortifications there. They threw up all these fortifications around Richmond here, so that the farming operations were very much upset. And then the crops were so often trampled upon and destroyed by the army that the farmers were discouraged, and then a large number of the negroes were sent away. I know of a good many sent to Florida and North Carolina. In my own family there were several hundred sent to Florida, and I know of over 100 being sent by old Mr. George Pendle to North Carolina. I think old Sam Harriston sent over 500 south during the War. All these things tended to destroy the value of land because they could make no profitable use of it, and the farm products in the State were decreasing every day, and this had advanced very far, by June, 1863. There became such scarcity of forage and everything of that sort, that the Confederate Government exempted from service a number of men and appointed them to stay on the farms and work. I recollect that Mr. R. S. Allen, of Tuckahoe, was appointed to stay on the farm and keep his farm going for the benefit of the Confederate Army.

Q. 6. Well, what proportion of diminution was there in the value of the lands from this cause?

A. Well, I can give you a personal example—my father had a place near Richmond that would have brought $50,000 in 1860, that sold after the war for $11,500.

Q. 7. I mean between the dates of 1861 and 1863, as mentioned above?

A. Well, you take the sales that were made at that time, of course they were made in depreciated currency and they look better than they really were. If you take the sales that were made in Confederate money in 1863, there would probably have been 1093 three times as much Confederate money paid for property as would have been paid for the same property in 1861. That is in the cities. In the country the depreciation was more, because it was very hard to sell any land except to men who were making money and who wanted to get rid of the Confederate money and bought largely of lands. But they were selected lands, like that farm of Dr. Welford's on the Rappahanock River, and like Mr. Jerry Morton's place in Orange County. That was sold in Confederate money for a pretty large sum. But the farm was worth in 1860 about $50,000. I think it sold for $300,000. But that was an exceptional transaction. It was a valuable farm, as the Welford farm, but you take the average lands in Virginia, they were not worth 25 per cent of their value in 1860 in good money.

Q. 8. Between those same dates of January 1, 1861, and June, 1863, what was the depreciation, if any, in the amount and value of the personal property in the State, according to your best judgment?

A. I should say that the estimate which Major Hunter gave of 50 per cent, was too high. I think it was less than fifty per cent.

He told you that he would put it at 50 per cent as a minimum. I think even that is too much.

Q. 9. The personal property in the State had diminished more than 50 per cent?

A. Oh, yes, sir. It had disappeared everywhere pretty large- 1094
ly. We had lost enormously in negro property, by the Northern Army taking them and sending them to the rear.

Note: The State of West Virginia, by her Attorney General, objects to each and all the foregoing questions, and the answers thereto, because the same are not responsive to the order of reference in this cause, and for other reasons apparent on the face of said questions and answers; and without waiving said objection, proceeds to cross examine the witness.

Cross Examination.

By the Attorney General of West Virginia.

XQ. 1. Mr. Williams, the depreciation in property you have just described was brought about mainly by a greatly depreciated currency, was it not?

A. No, I meant that it was destroyed. You know the State of Virginia had already furnished most of the horses and most of the cattle for the Confederate Army. The Southern States were too far off, and we needed our transportation for freight and men. So that very little live stock was brought here from any other State until the close of the war, when it had given out here practically, and we had to bring it from other States. We were foraging cattle in North Carolina in January and February, 1865.

XQ. 2. You have stated that at the beginning of the is- 1095 suing of Confederate money, which I believe was in 1861, it was at par?

A. It was about the same value as the United States greenbacks, but it depreciated steadily.

XQ. 3. What was its value in 1863?

A. The depreciation had advanced pretty far before the 1st of April, 1863, and then when we repudiated one-third of the currency it went much more rapidly. The fact is the credit of the Government was gone at that time. That book (referring to Matthews' Forms, p. 308) will give you the depreciation in January, 1863, three for one, February, four for one; March, five for one; April, five and one-half for one; May, five and one-half to five and three fourths for one; June, seven and one-half to eight for one; July, nine for one; August, twelve and one-half to thirteen for one; September, thirteen for one; October, fourteen for one; November, fifteen to seventeen for one; December eighteen to twenty for one.

POOR COPY

XQ. 4. How was it in 1861?

A. In 1861—May 1, 10 for 1, up to October, then it was 1.12 to 1.15 for 1; November, 1.15 for 1; December 1.20 for 1.

XQ. 5. In other words you paid $1.20 for a dollar in good money in December?

A. At that time the bank notes that were in circulation were considered pretty good money up until about 1863 or 1862.

Redirect Examination.

By Mr. Moon:

Q. 1. In 1863 what was the currency of the country here, the currency in which taxes were assessed and paid, and transactions of all kind had? 1096

A. The only currency in use was Confederate Treasury notes and State bank notes, but public confidence was a little stronger in State bank notes, and the people who got them in their possession kept them and paid out Confederate Treasury notes. One enormous loss to the State in the value of personal property was that the entire capital and assets of the banks in the State when the war broke out was in gold and silver and bank notes, which all drifted into Confederate money later, most of the gold and silver having drifted into the Confederate treasury.

Q. 2. What currency was the measure of value in 1863?

A. Confederate currency. The bank notes were for a long time at a premium but they became finally as worthless as Confederate money. There was practically no circulation except the Confederate notes. People held the bank notes because they did not want to part with them. They finally became worthless. But the Confederate currency was the only currency in use. If a man wanted to go abroad he found it very difficult to get gold and silver. He had to buy it at a premium. There was very little of it for sale.

Q. 3. Confederate money, then, as I understand it, was the basis upon which taxes were assessed and paid?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 4. In which all transactions were conducted? 1097

A. Yes, sir. If you offered a man $500 for a horse it was understood that that was Confederate money. However it was a mighty poor horse you could get for $500 in 1863—

Q. 5. In other words, $1 meant $1 in Confederate money.

A. That was all, sir.

Q. 6. Can you state what effect the causes you have mentioned had upon the value of stocks and other securities in the Commonwealth—bank stocks, stocks of insurance companies, manufacturing companies, and bonds of corporations, and other like properties?

A. Bank stocks, and the stock of other corporations, including railways, were constantly depreciating, and were finally entirely wiped out—banks, railroads, insurance companies, and everything else. There wasn't a share of any manufacturing or industrial corporation, or any other corporation in Virginia worth a dollar.

CAPTAIN W. GORDON McCABE,
being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

By the Attorney General of Virginia:

Q. 1. Captain McCabe, will you please state your age, and where you reside?

A. I am 67 years of age and live in Richmond.

Q. Please state where you were during the war between 1098 the States, and what opportunity you had for obtaining knowledge and information as to the condition of the farms, forests, fences, buildings, and lands generally in Virginia, and particularly in those portions of Virginia which were occupied either by the Federal or the Confederate Armies?

A. I believe I have slept in every man's cornfield in Virginia. I first went out with a company from the University when I was a lad at College, marched up the valley to seize Harpers' Ferry. We got all we wanted, and we wanted a good deal. I then came back to college, packed up my things and paid my debts. Then I enlisted in the Richmond Howitzers and served in the Army of the Peninsula. That was in 1861. And there is where I first commenced to see the devastation. I had been prepared for college at the Hampton Academy, and my sister lived there. That was one of the most flourishing places in Virginia. In the first place Magruder issued an order that the people must get out. The Yankees had advanced from Fortress Monroe, and had several times occupied the town of Hampton. He took up the idea that Hampton would be a most valuable place for them to put their troops in winter quarters, and determined to burn it. We burned everything 1099 in that town except the old church and the Whiting house and the old Hudgins house, and all those people were fugitives. That was a very rich country for trucking. They used to do a great deal of trucking. All that country was just wiped off. All those people had come up here to Richmond. Poor! Why, my sister who kept her horses and carriage, and had everything that a lady could have in those days—she had two children, she had a negro girl,—why she had to do her own cooking. Nobody had any idea how those poor children were.

Q. 3. What was the condition and effect of the occupation of the country by the two armies, upon the fences, forests and fields?

A. Well, in the Peninsula it was devastation. In 1862, after the battles around Richmond, I went into Charles City, New Kent, King William's County, and the next year in the Chancellorsville Campaign I was all up through Orange, Green, Madison—all through Northern Virginia. There were practically no roads at all. We used to drive our guns where we pleased. If we would go in the road they would go up to the hub, you know.

Q. 4. How were the fences in Northern Virginia?

A. They were down.

Q. 5. Did you go with the army through Northern Virginia on the Campaign of 1862?

A. No, sir. Now, in 1863, after the Chancellorsville Campaign, I was ordered to report to the Secretary of War in Richmond, who told me that he understood I had been a student of ordnance and gunnery. A man named Foote from Tennessee had of- 1100 fered them a breech loading gun that was going to do wonders. He ordered me to take a section of those guns to Charleston, South Carolina, where I used them against the enemies' gunboats from James Island. The guns didn't come for some time. I served in Fort Sumpter until that was knocked to pieces. Then I served in Battery Wagner, until it was evacuated.

Q. 6. When did you return to Virginia?

A. I came back that autumn and joined my battalion, and from the Wilderness down, I served through all the campaigns. I was at Appomattox Court House.

Q. 7. Can you mention any transaction or sales which came within your observation or knowledge, of real estate in 1863, which would illustrate the depreciation in the value of such property; if so, please state it.

A. Well, I lived at Westover, which was one of the show places on James River. It was one of the model plantations on the river, with 1,200 acres of land. It had splendid barns on it. Mr. John Selden, who owned it, was known as one of the best farmers in Virginia. He had a very large family. Westover was built by William Byrd II, who was the most cultured man in the western world of his day, the greatest wit. Had been educated in England. Studied in the Inner Temple. Also educated in France. He was a fellow of royal society. He spared no expense in building Westover. He went to Italy and had the chimney pieces for Westover carved by Italian sculptors and sent to this country. He was a man of enormous wealth. Westover was perfectly kept up before the war. 1101

I lived there in 1858 and 1859—two years. In 1859 John Selden was offered by Mr. Beirn $75,000 in good money for Westover.

Q. Did he accept it?

A. No, sir, he refused it. What did he want to sell Westover for. In 1862 when McClellans army fell back on Harrison's landing after the battle of Malvern Hill, Fitz-John Porter's Horse occupied Westover. While Fitz-John Porter did what he could, they absolutely destroyed everything on that place. They stole the mantle pieces out of the house and sent them to New York. I have been called upon since the war to make a drawing of the mantle piece in the drawing room, and the present owner has had a replica made of it and it is there now. They destroyed everything. Poor old Selden was broken in spirit by living in refuge and poverty and he sold Westover to Major Drury in 1863 for $60,000 in Confederate money, which he put in Confederate cotton bonds and they became worthless.

Q. 9. Do you know what month it was in 1863?

A. No, I do not. I only know that it was in 1863. I can't, of course, tell about that. It is just a matter of memory anyway.

I recall another sale—this is to the best of my knowledge and belief. My father-in-law was a rich man—Mr. Edmund Osborne of Petersburg. His brother was a rich man too. Mr. Osborne had a great deal of money and Judge Gholson was a great friend of his. Dr. Osborne urged his brother, Mr. Edmund, to buy Judge Gholson's place. Judge Gholson had most of his money in England, and Judge Gholson told him he would sell it to him for $100,000 in Confederate money. And the old man believed that the 1102 cause was going to win and he told him that he wouldn't give it to him, the place wasn't worth it. He sold that place for $25,000 in 1865 and was glad to get it.

Q. 10. What was the condition of the farming interests of Tidewater, Virginia, particularly on the Peninsula, in 1863?

A. Well, it was a scene of desolation. The fences were down. The enemy would send raiding parties up from Newport News, where they had a strong base, as well as from Fortress Monroe, and what they couldn't steal they would destroy, and there were no improvements or repairs.

Q. 11. What was the condition of the country in the region around Norfolk in 1863?

A. I can't tell you anything about it, I wasn't there.

Q. 12. Norfolk was occupied by the Federal troops.

A. Of course, it was. But I do not know what the condition was all through Culpepper, Orange, and the country all down through there. The roads were quagmires. They would take the fences and make fires out of them. The roads made a great impression on me—much more than they would on an infantry officer—because I was an artillery officer.

Q. 13. What was the condition of the highway bridges of Northern Virginia, in the Peninsula and in the valley—the country with which you were familiar—in 1863?

A. You know as well as I do about that. You know what they did. I can only repeat what everybody knows. They were in a very bad condition. Of course they were very bad. But 1103 you must remember that we had an engineer corps, and we would bring up the engineers when we couldn't pull the guns over, and they would fix them the best they could. Everything was going to the devil—that is the plain English of it.

Q. 14. What was the effect of the operations of the two armies upon the supply of live stock in the regions through which the armies marched?

A. There wasn't any. The live stock was swept away.

Q. 15. What was the financial condition of the people of Virginia generally in 1863?

A. Well, I can't speak of the people of Virginia generally. All I know were dead poor. But nobody thought about money. Nobody had any money. It wasn't considered very genteel to have money. It wasn't very respectable to have money.

Q. 16. What was the condition of the railroads in Confederate Virginia in 1863?

A. Everything was run down. You know the rails were built, some of them, with scrap iron. I can't remember ever having been in a passenger car when I used to come down and go away. I used to ride in box cars pretty much all the time. When the troops were moved we always travelled in box cars or on flats. The trains were never on time and were always running off the track.

DEPOSITIONS OF GEORGE W. ATKINSON ON BEHALF OF THE DEFENDANT.

Deposition of George W. Atkinson, taken by the State of West Virginia, to be filed and read as evidence in her behalf in the cause of the Commonwealth of Virginia against the State of West Virginia, pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, which deposition is taken by the consent of the parties on the 14th day of July, 1909, at the law office of Mollohan, McClintic and Matthews in the City of Charleston, County of Kanawha and State of West Virginia. 1

Present on behalf of the defendant, the State of West Virginia: George W. McClintic, of counsel.

Present on behalf of the plaintiff, the Commonwealth of Virginia: John B. Lightfoot, Jr., by appointment of William A. Anderson, Attorney-General of Virginia.

JUDGE GEORGE W. ATKINSON, a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes as follows, to-wit:

(Direct examination, conducted by George W. McClintic, Esq.)

Q. State your age, residence and present occupation.

A. I was sixty-four years old a few days ago; my legal residence is Charleston, Kanawha County, West Virginia; my present official residence is Washington, D. C.; Associate Judge of the United States Court of Claims.

Q. What other official positions under the Government of the United States have you held, if any?

A. I was four years United States Marshal and nearly four years United States District Attorney; and a member of Congress at one time.

Q. What official position did you hold, if any, under the 2
Government of the State of West Virginia?

A. I was four years Governor of this State, from March 4, 1897, to March 3, 1901, inclusive.

Q. In what county in West Virginia were you born and raised?

A. Kanawha County.

Q. In what county in West Virginia were you living from the year 1861 to 1865?

A. In Kanawha County.

Q. What official position, if any, did your father, James Atkinson, hold during the period from 1861 to 1863, previous to the formation of the State of West Virginia in 1863?

A. Sheriff of Kanawha County.

Q. In what parts of what is now the State of West Virginia were you familiar—with what parts were you familiar from the year 1861 to June 20, 1863?

A. Kanawha County, Fayette, Nicholas, one or two trips to Greenbrier County, also Jackson and Roane Counties. I was also in Putnam and Mason a time or two.

Q. Was the section of West Virginia with which you were familiar overrun by the armies either of the Confederate or Union side?

A. By both, at times. The section of the state I have mentioned with which I was familiar during that period was most overrun, I think, by home guards of both armies. The Confederate army occupied Charleston at the beginning of the War and soon thereafter was driven from this valley by Federal forces under the command of General J. D. Cox, of Ohio troops. This section, if I remember correctly, remained under the control of the Federal 3 army until September, 1862, when the Confederates entered the valley from the east and drove the Federal forces under the command of General Lightburn across the Ohio River into the State of Ohio.

Q. You spoke of home guards; please explain what you mean by home guards, and what was their usual occupation, on each side?

A. The home guards were composed of militiamen principally under the command of captains, and participated as parts of both armies. Their principal occupation, we used to think during the War, was that of stealing and marauding. The Union home guards pursued the Confederate citizens or those who sympathized with the Confederacy, and vice versa; so that the marauding was pretty general all through these counties during that period; and I remember distinctly that our citizens feared them much worse than they did the army on either side so far as maintaining and protecting their property was concerned.

Q. Was it not a fact that these home guards often took the lives of opponents without any pretense of trial or otherwise?

A. Unquestionably so, on both sides. It was a common occurrence to hear of men being killed all around these adjacent counties, first by Union home guards and also by Confederate home guards.

Q. What was the condition of this section spoken of by you as to security of property during the period from the beginning of the War to the 20th day of June, 1863, and thereabouts? 4

A. There was practically no security of property at all, either of Union people or of Confederate people.

Q. What effect did this state of affairs have upon the value of property, both real and personal, during that period?

A. It necessarily materially reduced the values of all kinds of property all through this region of country.

Q. What proportion of able-bodied men of soldier age were in the two armies from this section of the country, in your opinion?

A. I am quite sure a decided majority of the men of both sides went into one army or the other. I could hardly say with any degree of exactness as to the proportion, but I should say anywhere from sixty-five to seventy-five per cent. of able-bodied men, middle-aged and young men, volunteered on both sides during that period.

Q. State any specific instance of which you may know that the Confederate army took the property of Union sympathizers and confiscated the same during this period?

A. When General Loring came into this section, the leading or prominent men of the Union side left this section in advance of General Lightburn's retreating force, and remained in Ohio until the Federal troops returned to Charleston. The rule, as I understood it then, was for the Confederates to prey off the property of the Yankee sympathizers; and I can recollect one particular instance of their taking property away, and that was from the dry goods and grocery store owned by my father and Greenberry Slack. They had a right good sized store of goods here in Charleston, and General Loring's forces took it all. They, however, offered to pay for it in Confederate money, but very little or a comparatively small part of it was taken in comparison with the value of the goods, because it was worthless money; so it was on the whole a practical taking. I am quite sure other people here lost property the same way, but I do not recollect any particular instance now.

Q. Do you remember the condition of the roads and bridges in this section of the State of West Virginia at that time, up to the 20th of June, 1863, or thereabouts?

A. My recollection is that practically all of the bridges, if not all of them, were destroyed by one side or the other. I know that General Lightburn destroyed the wire suspension bridge across Elk River after crossing it to prevent the Confederates from pursuing him. I also remember distinctly that the bridge across Coal River was destroyed, but I cannot recollect which army did that job, or whether it was before or after General Loring's entrance into this valley in the fall of the year 1862.

Q. Was there much emigration from this section of the valley with which you were acquainted during the period from 1861 to 1863 by people going to Ohio as Union men or to Dixey or the South as Confederate sympathizers?

A. A very large proportion of our population went West and South, Union people going towards Ohio and into Ohio and the Confederates southward, principally to Virginia. There were times from 1861 to 1863 when there were very few able-bodied men in all this section, round about Charleston.

Q. Do you remember whether or not there was talk or scare of confiscation of property by either Union people or by Confederate people according as to the one who should win, during the period of which we have been speaking?

A. That feeling existed to a very great extent from the beginning to the close of the Civil War, as no one seemed to know then, or at least during the first half of the War which side was going to win. I have always regarded the battle of Gettysburg the decisive battle of the War; and after that event the Union people were quite confident of success. Prior to that time no one knew what the result would be, and there was a great fear of confiscation of property on both sides.

Cross Examination.

By Mr. Lightfoot:

Q. Judge, when the War broke out in the year 1861, you were, I believe, according to your statement of your present age, about fifteen or sixteen years old.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you actively enlisted in the army?

A. I was not.

Q. Your observations or events in the counties and districts you have mentioned were obtained principally by the casual visits which you might have made from one county to another and not as a soldier with the armies? 7

A. That is correct.

Q. In answer to Mr. McClintic's question whether or not the sections you have mentioned were overrun by the armies of both sides you have stated that at times they were subject to the depredations of the home guards. I take it that this answer means that the actual organized force neither of the Confederate nor of the Union army occupied this section for any lengthy period of time between 1861 and 1863; is that correct?

A. The Federal troops occupied this valley practically all the time from early in 1861, indeed, all the time from 1861 until General Loring came in in 1862 and drove them out. Then the Federal forces were reinforced, and, in a very short time after General Loring came in, returned and drove him out, and from that time until the close of the War the Federal forces occupied this entire valley.

Q. When you speak of the valley, please designate the valley to which you refer.

A. The Great Kanawha Valley.

Q. Are these facts which you state as to the occupancy of the valley by the Federal and Confederate organized forces made as a matter of historical information or from your own knowledge and information, seeing the armies there?

A. I speak principally of my own recollection. I do not recollect any return of Confederate troops in this valley after General Loring retreated from it.

Q. That was when? 8

A. 1862. I do recollect a raid made through the Ohio Valley, crossing the Kanawha in the neighborhood of its mouth that created quit a stir down in that section, but that was more confined to the Ohio Valley than the Kanawha.

Q. Who made that raid?

A. General Albert G. Jenkins.

Q. Is it not a fact, after the year 1862, with the exception of the Jenkins raid that you have mentioned and the further exception of a raid by General William E. Jones, there was no Confederate occupation of this valley west of Greenbrier and the border counties?

A. I do not think Jones came as far west as Greenbrier county. My recollection is that his raid was up in the neighborhood of Philippi, Elkins, Grafton and that region. I do not recollect any raids of regular Confederate soldiers other than those I have mentioned; but all the while the home guards were marauding and had our people scared, terrified, practically throughout the whole of the War.

Q. Judge, the term "home guards" must have been a misnomer if the men who constituted them didn't guard the home, but on the contrary were marauders?

A. The Union home guards were intended to protect the loyal citizens and the Confederate home guards were to protect those who sympathized with the Confederacy. However, the name that followed them all through the War was that they were not much short of pirates on both sides. I do not think that the Union home guards ever stole property from the Union people—they did their capturing from the Confederates, and vice versa. 9

Q. What percentage of the personal property of the section which you have mentioned would you say was absolutely destroyed by the depredations of those home guards?

A. I could not give any correct estimate of the amount of property destroyed. That would be impossible; and personally I know very little about their destruction of property. They confined their action chiefly to capturing property and carrying it off all around Charleston in Kanawha County.

Q. What character of property?

A. Anything they could get their hands on and remove.

Q. Do you think that the extent of these depredations was sufficient to make an appreciable decrease in the total valuation of personal property in this section?

A. Unquestionably so; because no one had encouragement for the production of personal property. They managed to raise enough to live on. There was no such thing as people's producing with a view of increasing their property or their wealth. It was a matter simply of living through the pendency of the War.

Q. Judge, is it not true that the farmers had an open and ready market and sale with the Union forces, and with the markets west of them, and with their home markets, for all the products of their farms, both agricultural and live stock?

A. Yes, to a certain extent in this immediate section and along the Kanawha River while the Federal troops were in control, but the people who lived along this valley did not know what 10 day the Federal troops would be driven out; hence, they had no encouragement to produce property for sale. And my recollection is quite distinct that very few products of any kind were raised in this section during the entire period of the War. I know this, and I know it well, that not only did the Federal Army supply itself with the necessary supplies for the support of its soldiery, but also that most of the people who lived in this town, if not all of them, got their supplies from Gallipolis, Ohio, by means of steamboats which plied this Kanawha River during that part of the War when the Federal troops were in charge.

Q. When the Federal troops supplied themselves from the farms of the people, did they not pay for the supplies which they obtained?

A. I do not recollect any instance of the Federal army buying any supplies from the farmers in this section. They might, however, have done so. But I recollect vividly the fact that hay for their horses and the bacon, beans and other supplies for the men, were shipped here on steamboats from Gallipolis, Ohio. My recollection further is that none of the farmers, certainly with my recollection, raised anything to sell to the army or to anybody else during the period of the War. My father owned a large farm five miles from Charleston on Elk River, and I am very sure he never sold a dollar's worth to anybody during the entire period of the Civil War, or I would recollect it. 11

Q. Taking the County of Kanawha, would you say that the personal property in that county during the period of the War was, in the aggregate, decreased by reason of these depredations?

A. Unquestionably and materially so.

Q. Going further west, would you say that the same is true of Jackson County?

A. In a general way, I should say yes, although I did not know so much about Jackson County as I did about Kanawha, as I lived here. Yet I often saw people from Jackson County who came to this county.

Q. Mason County?

A. It would be less in Mason County, I think.

Q. How about the Pan Handle—in the northern part of the State?

A. I do not think it was disturbed during the War in any way materially, except the time General Morgan went across the Ohio River and went over or through Ohio and was captured near Steubenville; and I have heard a great many people in Wheeling say that they were badly scared for fear General Morgan might cross into the City of Wheeling and burn the city. I speak somewhat knowingly on this point, because some eight or ten years after the War closed I moved to Wheeling and lived there for twenty years.

Q. When was that raid, Judge—approximately?

A. 'Long about 1864, I think. 12

Q. How long did it last?

A. Morgan was in Ohio—he was engaged in marching through Ohio two or three weeks.

Q. Then, as a matter of fact, the depreciation of property in the Pan Handle resulting from the terrified condition of the people did not last over two or three weeks?

A. Yes; I do not think property very much depreciated up there on account of that raid. The fear was that he might cross into West Virginia and destroy the towns and cities in that section.

Q. Now, Judge, from your information generally as to the situation in West Virginia during the War, did personal property in the whole state depreciate in its valuation during the War?

A. Unquestionably so, taking it as a whole.

Q. Do you know Judge J. M. McWhorter?

A. Very well.

Q. Do you know what position he held immediately after the War?

A. Yes, sir; he was State Auditor of West Virginia. He was the second Auditor elected in West Virginia after the State was formed.

Q. What do you think of Judge McWhorter's opportunities for observations of the conditions which you have mentioned?

A. They were as good as anybody's in the section of the state where he lived and moved among the people.

Q. Was Judge McWhorter reckoned a careful and accurate 13 Auditor?

A. A very competent and able man.

Q. If it were stated to you that Judge McWhorter's report as Auditor to the legislature of West Virginia showed an increase in the valuation of personal property in the County of Kanawha for the period between 1860 and 1865, would it not tend to change your opinion somewhat that you have expressed that personal property in Kanawha County depreciated in that period?

Question objected to by counsel for the defendant, because Judge McWhorter never reported anywhere for the period between 1860 and 1865, but published an Auditor's report for the year 1865.

A. While I have confidence in Judge McWhorter's ability, integrity and correctness, yet I do not believe that such statement was borne out by the facts. If property, as you stated in your question, in this county increased from 1860 or 1861 to 1865, I would account—

Counsel for the Commonwealth of Virginia objects to Judge Atkinson's answer continuing, so far as he attempts to account for Judge McWhorter's report.

(Answer concluded). I would account for it in two ways: First, by the assessors who fixed the value upon personal property and real estate in the county. As every one knows, no two 14 assessors will value property upon the same basis or by the same rule. And, secondly, that this large increase to which Judge McWhorter refers was doubtless created during the last year of the War, after it was practically settled that the Union, in the great conflict, would prevail in the end. Then values began to look upward.

Q. Without waiving the objection made to the answer, I will ask you this: Taking the first of your explanations, that is, that the assessors valued property in Kanawha County different from what other assessors would have done, is it not true that those assessors had greater and more accurate opportunity to ascertain the value of that property than you yourself did?

A. I will admit that an assessor ought to know more exactly the value of personal and real property in the county than I; but I certainly know that no two assessors ever valued the same property at the same rate.

Q. Now, taking the second of your explanations, that is, that the increase shown did, in your opinion, occur in the year 1864, and assuming that this is true for the purpose of the question, does not that indicate that any depreciation was fictitious rather than actual; that is, that the property itself had not diminished, but that its supposed value was lessened by reason of the apprehension of the people? 15

A. To a certain extent, that might be true.

Q. Now, I will ask you further, if it were stated to you that the same report of Judge McWhorter, just referred to, stated that the aggregate increase in values of property, real and personal, in the State of West Virginia, for the period between 1860 and 1865, was $6,170,946.00, would that not tend to change your opinion that property within the whole state of West Virginia depreciated during the War?

Counsel for the defendant objects to the question, because Judge McWhorter never did state in printed report, or otherwise, that the property increased the said sum during the period from 1860 to 1865, but Judge McWhorter did compare the assessment of 1860, as made by the Commonwealth of Virginia, with the assessment of 1865, which assessment was made after the close of the War, as made by the State of West Virginia, and the difference between the two assessments was the sum stated.

A. No, it would not. I have no doubt but that property values did increase in the upper part of the state to some extent during the period of the War, which part was not burdened by soldiers of either side; but for the southern portion of the state, I cannot believe, taking the whole period of the War, that the valuation of personal property and real estate increased at all. On the contrary, I am quite confident that it did not do so. Furthermore, the so-called increase to which Judge McWhorter referred, is fully explained in the objection just above made by the counsel for the State of West Virginia.

Q. I now read you from Judge McWhorter's report for the year 1865, part of page 51, second paragraph, of said report, as follows:

> "By the returns of commissioners of the revenue of the several counties of this State in 1860, as ascertained from the report of Mr. Bennett, Auditor of Public Accounts of Virginia, made in the year 1861, the value of real estate assessed for taxation, according to the valuation made in 1856, amounted to the sum of $81,583,891.41. According to the United States census returns of 1860, the aggregate value of the real estate of the resident citizens of the respective counties amounted to the sum of $110,623,845.08, showing an excess of $29,039,933.67 in valuation not assessed for taxation. When we take into consideration that this excess arises from the valuation of the real estate of the resident owners only, several millions would be added to the excess by the valuation of large tracts held by non-residents which are not included in the census reports. This is the result of a comparison of the census returns with the valuation made four years previous, and when we consider that the value of real estate has enhanced each year since in an increased ratio, we might reasonably expect that a valuation made at this time would more than double the aggregate valuation as it now stands."

This is the expressed opinion of Judge McWhorter as Auditor. So far as real estate is concerned, would it not tend to change your opinion, if you have expressed such, that the value of real estate depreciated during the War in the State of West Virginia?

A. I have never said that the value of the real estate in West Virginia, in all of the counties in West Virginia, depreciated during the War. As I have stated, the upper portion of the State did not suffer very materially from the results of the War. But I adhere to my former statement, that in the whole southern tier of counties, with many of which I was familiar during the War as a young man living here in Kanawha County, it did materially depreciate. I do not now recollect, within my own personal knowledge, of the sale or offering for sale of real estate in this section during that period. A general deadness prevailed because of the uncertainty of the result of the War and because of the scarcity of money with which to purchase property. It was a struggle on the part of most of our people to support themselves and families during that terrible period of the War.

Q. Referring to personal property, I now read you from Judge McWhorter's same report, page 48, as follows:

> "There have been no assessments made in several of 18
> the counties for the year 1865, consequently the figures > given are but estimates for such counties. The assessments > for 1860 are taken from the report of Mr. Bennett, Auditor > of Public Accounts of Virginia, made in 1861. A large al> lowance has been made for the loss of property in those > counties which suffered most during the rebellion. By this > estimate the value of Personal Property in the year 1865, > exceeds that of 1860 in the sum of $6,170,946. When we take > into consideration what has been the prosperity of those > counties not immediately exposed to the ravages and desola> tion of war, to thus overcome the loss sustained by the others, > and still give this excess, it is highly gratifying."

Calling your attention to the fact that Judge McWhorter, in his estimate of the increase in value of personal property during the period covered by the War, has made "large allowance * * * * for the loss of property in those counties which suffered most during the rebellion," would you not now say that your opinion, as expressed, and which I understand is based on your observations as a young man from fifteen to nineteen years, would be changed by this expressed opinion of Judge McWhorter?

A. Not materially: First, because, as I have heretofore stated, of the inequality of values placed upon property by assessors; and, secondly, that at the beginning of the year 1865 the War was practically settled, and because business of all kinds as well as values of all kinds increased in dimensions. I can not believe that 19 from 1861 to 1864 there was any increase of personal property, not, certainly, in any of the southern tier of counties. On the contrary, I shall always believe, from what I saw myself and heard during that period, that such values decreased.

Q. Excepting the southern tier of counties referred to, you would not be willing to say that said increase did not take place in the remaining counties, would you?

A. No, sir; I would not, especially in the northern tier of counties.

Q. Would you be willing to say that there was not such an increase in the counties, exclusive of what you term the southern tier of counties, sufficient on the average, considering any depreciation in that southern tier, to cause the increase noted by Judge McWhorter?

A. No; not altogether; because my candid judgment is that the increase to which Judge McWhorter refers was for the entire year of 1865, when the War has closed and when business of all kinds had started up, thus making a demand for the development of all kinds of property.

Q. Did you know Mr. J. R. Dodge, who was an official of the United States Department of Agriculture in 1865?

A. I never knew him personally. I have heard of him. His name is very familiar to me.

Q. Was he a man of accredited reputation in the State?

A. I would take him so to be. 20

Q. In a book written by Mr. J. R. Dodge in August of 1865, in the preface of which he acknowledges valuable information and suggestions from twenty or thirty seemingly prominent men, amongst them Honorable W. T. Willey, Governor A. I. Boreman, Honorable John M. Phelps, J. H. Dis DeBar and Mr. McWhorter, in Chapter 3, discussing the value of lands, I find on page 42 the following paragraph:

> "Indeed, it would be difficult to compute with accuracy, in Federal Currency, the actual appreciation already attained at the present writing, since the census of 1860. It would amount to tens of millions of dollars in advanced rates at which property is held, much of which is founded upon actual cash purchases within the past year. While this advance is mainly speculative, there is energy and enterprise and skill enough, as well as capital, interested and actually engaged in the development of these valuable resources, to insure a steady and permanent progress of industrial improvement."

Do you not think that the opinion of Mr. Dodge thus expressed, and which is substantiated by that of Judge McWhorter, should have the effect to change your own opinion as to the depreciation of realty?

A. Not altogether. That book was written after the close of the Civil War and when industries of all kinds began to start up, when people had turned their eyes in the direction of West Virginia and came into our midst for the purpose of becoming citizens of our new Commonwealth and to take a hand in its development. Property values, of course, increased at a very rapid rate. More- 21 over, the opinion expressed in the book is extremely roseate, and was intended to encourage our own people, to encourage more than had theretofore been done the development of the natural resources of the counties which composed the new State which were then known to be very great. Our leading newspapers at that time published glowing articles intended to encourage immigration and to encourage our own people, which were laudable, indeed, and which proved to be very helpful. Not only the book of Mr. Dodge, but other pamphlets and publications were made with this object in view. I do not mean to say that the development which they portrayed was incorrect, but at that time, to say the least, such articles and publications were exceedingly roseate.

Q. In view of your reply, I call your attention to the fact that Mr. Dodge had founded his opinion, certainly to some extent, upon his report of actual instances. To substantiate this, I read you from page 44 of the same book, a paragraph which occurs in connection with Mr. Dodge's discussion of the lands purchased by George Washington and other great people.

> "As an evidence of the quality of these lands, it may be stated that George Edwards, upon similar lands in the vicinity, near Moundsville, sold sufficient hay in 1863 and 1864, in addition to pasturage for his cattle, to make an average of one hundred dollars per acre for his farm, a profit equivalent to its cost."

Would not that indicate that Mr. Dodge was not drawing 22 wholly on his imagination?

A. In the first place, our first great president never purchased any lands in West Virginia. He located them and secured them by tomahawk titles. In the next place, I have no doubt that George Edwards in Marshall County, one of the best farming counties in the State of its size, raised and sold the hay Mr. Dodge referred to, and that, as you know, is in the extreme northern part of the State where farmers and other producers were not disturbed during the War. That kind of hay growing did not exist down in this region of the State, I am sure.

Q. Now, Judge Atkinson, as a last reference to this matter, I will read you a paragraph from page 147 of the same book, occurring in Mr. Dodge's discussion of the personal property of West Virginia, as follows:

> "In some counties great losses have been incurred in live stock from marauding, particularly in horses. Yet the State returns for 1862 give an increase in horses, over 1860, in the counties of Barbour, Brooke, Cabell, Doddridge, Harrison, Hancock, Jackson, Kanawha, Lewis, Monongalia, Marshall, Ohio, Preston, and several others. In some cases this increase is extraordinary, as in Kanawha, from 1402 to 5222, doubtless due to a great influx from Fayette and Greenbrier, on the great highway of Rebeldom and from which there is no report. The same disturbing causes have affected other stock to the same extent. Sheep had already increased 23 in 1862, in Brooke, from 40,620 to 46,200; in Hancock, from 21,402 to 29,932; in Harrison, from 13,202 to 17,991; in Monongalia, from 10,945 to 17,594; in Marshall, from 16,022 to 22,197; in Preston, from 19,084 to 25,980. Since that date there has been a still heavier increase."

I now ask you if this assertion of Mr. Dodge, taking his information from the returns for the year 1862, does not indicate to you a large increase in the values of personal property, at least so far as live stock was concerned?

A. The comparison made by Mr. Dodge is between 1860, when the War was coming on and shaping itself for its horrible disasters, and 1862, before it had well begun. If he had made his comparison between 1860 and 1863, it would have been, in my judgment, materially different.

Q. You spoke of General Loring's offering to pay for the dry goods and grocery store of your father in Confederate money. Did your father accept this offer?

A. I did not mean to say that General Loring himself offered to pay anything. It was his men that supplied themselves with the goods I referred to, and they had, as I was informed, a bountiful supply of Confederate money. My father and his partner, Mr. Slack, were not in Charleston at the time, they having refugeed to Ohio from fear of personal injury of Confederate soldiers. The store was in charge of a clerk. I knew nothing of it myself personally, only I know that when the Confederates left here there were no goods left in the store; and I often heard my father say that he made no inquiry about the Confederate money to pay for the goods, 24 if they were paid for, because such money was of no value here.

Q. At what date was this taking of your fathers property?

A. In September, 1862.

Q. Do you know what the ratio of Confederate money to gold was in September, 1862?

A. I do not, in this section, or in any section for that matter. I know that here it could not be passed as currency at all, at least that is my recollection of it.

Q. Do you know that Confederate money, in September, 1862, passed current in the State of Virginia and all over the South and had purchasing power?

A. I do.

Q. If your father had accepted the Confederate money which was offered him and had demanded enough to have been equal to the gold value of his goods, was it not possible for him to realize value received in September, 1862, for that Confederate currency?

A. I hardly think it was; because he could not go to Richmond or to any place in the South to exchange it for good money. First, he would be afraid to go; and second, he could not get greenback money in the South that would be current here. Moreover, he was not here, as I have stated; and so far as I know, he never received any value whatever from any source for the goods taken.

Q. If he did not receive this value, however, it was not the 25 fault of the parties taking it, as I understand your deposition, so far as that value was estimated in Confederate money?

A. As I was not personally present at the time the goods were taken, I know nothing about the amount tendered or the amount paid to any one in the store. My information was then that General Loring's order was that his troops should not improvidently destroy property of any kind. A number of buildings were destroyed upon his entrance to this town, but they were all burned by the retreating Federal troops. I do not recollect a single building that was destroyed in this section by General Loring's order.

Q. I understood you to say that you do not recollect a single instance of the taking of any personal property by any of the regularly organized forces of either side without payment being made or tendered therefor: is that correct?

A. Of my own personal knowledge, I do not know of the destruction of any personal property by General Loring's troops.

Re-Direct Examination.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Was not the year 1865, under the stable government then established in the State of West Virginia and under the protection thus given to all property in this State, a year of great speculation in all sorts of enterprises in the State of West Virginia?

A. My recollection is that it was.

Q. Was not most of the lands up Elk River, for instance, leased or purchased for oil purposes in the year 1865?

A. I knew of a large number of oil leases being made on Elk 26 River, and I knew of one sale of a small tract of land at the mouth of Two Mile on Elk, which tract sold at what we considered a fabulous price, being in the neighborhood of forty thousand dollars. My father owned something like one thousand acres five miles from Charleston on Elk River, and he was offered forty-five thousand dollars cash for it, but he asked fifty thousand, and allowed the five thousand dollars between them to defeat the sale; and subsequently, after his death, I, as administrator of his estate, sold it for about ten thousand dollars.

Q. Wasn't the period of the spring of 1863 the period of the greatest depression in the values of both real and personal property in this section of West Virginia?

A. I think it was.

Q. If there really were 5,222 horses in the County of Kanawha in 1862, being four times more than there were in 1860, did not that include all the cavalry horses of the Union and Confederacy in the county?

Counsel for the Commonwealth of Virginia objects to this question, on account of the fact that it calls for an expression of opinion by the witness, unless said question is answered from the personal knowledge of the witness.

A. I do not know about that; it may have done so, and yet 27 it may not.

Q. Was there not a considerable influx of people, especially of Union people seeking protection, into the County of Kanawha during the War?

Same objection to this question as was made to the preceding question.

A. There was.

And further dependent saith not.

Signature of witness waived.

Counsel for the Commonwealth of Virginia objects to the answers of the witness to all of the foregoing questions so far as the said answers show that they are not made from his own personal knowledge.

Counsel for the State of West Virginia excepts to all of the questions asked by the counsel for the Commonwealth of Virginia in so far as they assume facts as true from publications or other works not in evidence in this case.

Counsel for the Commonwealth of Virginia here states that in so far as the publications from which he read or quoted were read and quoted, they were considered by him as in evidence in this cause.

TESTIMONY ON BEHALF OF COMPLAINANT UNDER PARAGRAPH VI OF THE DECREE.

testified as follows:

Mr. Anderson: The next is Plaintiff's Exhibit F-1. This is responsive to the sixth paragraph of the decree. It purports to be a statement of all money paid into the Treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included in the State of West Virginia during the period prior to the admission of the latter State into the Union.

By Mr. Anderson:

Q. State what you know as to the correctness of that statement, how it was made up, by whom it was made up, and from what sources of information.

A. The figures in the first division, redemption of land and escheats, were taken from the Auditor's ledgers, from 1816 to 1822, and the Literary Fund Journals A, B and C. The redemption of lands and escheats were payments to the Literary Fund.

The second division, public lands and the Land Registrar's Office, were taken from the yearly printed report of the Auditor of Public Accounts.

Q. Fines, forfeitures and penalties is another item?

A. They were taken from the Literary Fund Journals, A, B and C.

Q. And the largest item of that account, contributions to the general treasury of Virginia in the shape of taxes by the counties now constituting the State of West Virginia—from what source did you derive that statement? 77

A. First, from the ledgers of the Auditor of Public Accounts, and afterwards verified by reference to the various journals and day books.

Q. Please state your knowledge, Mr. Potter, as to the correctness of the items and statements embodied in this schedule, in particular and in general?

A. The figures were taken off by my assistants, and—

Q. From what?

A. From the various books I have just mentioned, and then handed to other men who called them back. It was not possible to check them up to any total, so we merely applied the rule of the double check. That is true of all the items contained in the schedule, which I believe are correct.

Mr. Anderson: Please file that.

(The paper referred to, entitled, "Commonwealth of Virginia vs. the State of West Virginia. Receipts from West Virginia counties. Redemption lands and escheats. Public lands and Land Registrar's Office. Fines, forfeitures and penalties. Tax receipts (Less tax refunds). Article VI." is filed herewith, marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit F 1.")

Mr. Anderson: Plaintiff's Exhibit F 2 is the same statement, giving the details a little more fully.

The Special Master: Is it supplementary to Plaintiff's Exhibit F 1?

Mr. Robinson: Yes. 78

By Mr. Spooner: Will you give me the pages of the records from which you compiled these?

A. I don't know whether that is shown in this schedule or not. In a great many instances the journals were not paged. In those cases we show the years—

Q. From what page to what page, of what books?

A. Those do not show any pages at all.

Mr. Anderson: I offer this second statement in evidence.

(The paper referred to is filed herewith, marked, "Plaintiff's Exhibit F 2.") resumed the stand for further

Cross Examination.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. In relation to F-1 No. 6—

The Special Master: Do you mean page 6?

Mr. McClintic: Plaintiff's Exhibit F-1.

The Special Master: Relating to the 6th paragraph?

Mr. McClintic: Relating to the 6th paragraph of the decree.

The Special Master: What page are you examining?

Mr. McClintic: I was looking at the first page. I want to 383 ask a general question. This exhibit is in relation to the receipts from Virginia counties.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. When did you begin?

A. The fiscal year ending September 30, 1820.

Q. The first of the year?

A. The fiscal year.

Q. In other words, the 1st of October?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And when did you end?

A. December 31, 1860.

Q. That is all I desire to ask on that schedule.

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1909. Direct Examination of T. B. Dixcy.]

Mr. McClintic: Please take defendant's exhibit F-1. 567

(The paper referred to was received in evidence and marked Defendant's Exhibit F-1.)

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Please state if that was made under your direction and signed by you?

A. It was, sir.

Q. Please state if the facts and figures therein stated are correct?

A. They are so far as the items included therein from the books of original entry of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Q. On the bottom of page 2 of that exhibit I find "Merchant's & Mechanics Bank of Wheeling: sale of 400 shares bonus stock, held by the Board of Public Works, $43,103.35." Please explain to the Master that item.

A. That was bonus stock issued to the Commonwealth of Virginia by this bank located in Wheeling. It was in the nature of a franchise tax. It could be paid for in stock, and in this case the tax was paid by the stock. It was par value $40,000, and it was held by the State until 1853 and then sold for $43,103.35.

The Special Master: That is where you got that item?

The Witness: That is the item, yes. It was entered in the books in 1857, but the sale, I believe, took place in 1853.

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1909. Cross Examination of T. B. Dixey.]

[Mr. Harrison:]

Q. Next is defendant's Exhibit F-1. This relates to paragraph 6 of the decree—all moneys paid into the Treasury of the Commonwealth by the counties included within the territory of West Virginia. Please state the difference between the result ascertained by you and that shown by the corresponding exhibit for the plaintiff? 655

A. Under paragraph 6, according to the Virginia Exhibit, the receipts from West Virginia counties are $6,111,572.23, and according to West Virginia's Exhibit, $7,081,538.48, an excess on West Virginia's Exhibit of $969,966.25. 656

Q. Did your list of payments include any dividends received on stock of private companies?

A. Stock of private companies?

Q. Yes.

The Special Master: In which the State was a stockholder?

Mr. Harrison: Yes.

A. Yes; it included dividends on stock in banks located within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia, dividends on stock in turnpike companies, lying wholly within the present State of West Virginia, dividends on stock in bridge companies lying wholly within the present State of West Virginia, and dividends on stock in turnpike companies extending into and between the present States, divided on a mileage basis.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. Does the schedule show the several amounts under those heads?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you can show it in the aggregate. Could you do it readily for us now?

A. I think so.

Q. I want to know how much you have included as payments into the treasury embraced under the heads you have just given us?

A. There are same other items included with those dividends. For instance, there is some interest on loans. 657

The Special Master: Why do you not have them worked out when they work out the other details in connection with the other schedules, unless you want to get the information right now?

Mr. Harrison: His statement, for example, says "Dividends on stocks in banks located in the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia."

The Special Master: That is a large item, $766,666.

Mr. Harrison: That accounts for the biggest part of the difference.

The Special Master: What do you want: The detail of that?

A. You mean from what banks that came?

Mr. Harrison: I want it first to give the items so as to show the aggregate amount received and charged on account of stock dividends, and so forth. Then I wanted the details supporting it.

A. Very well, we can give you that, but it will take some little while, maybe a few hours, to prepare it and have it typewritten.

Mr. Harrison: Evidently the difference between Mr. Potter and himself arises out of the fact that he has charged dividends as money contributed by West Virginia counties to the Treasurer of the State.

The Special Master: Are those the same items involved 658 in the other schedules as to which the investments of the State in the stock are taken into consideration?

Mr. Spooner: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: The same banks?

Mr. Anderson: These were dividends received by the State during that period from those investments.

The Special Master: Upon one side the territory is being charged with the investment, and upon the other side they are taking a credit for the dividends, are they, in the same banks in which the investments were made?

Mr. McClintic: The same banks; yes, sir.

The Special Master: That is, in one part of the schedule West Virginia is charged with investments in the stock.

Mr. McClintic: Virginia charged us with investments in the stocks, and gave us no credit for the dividends.

The Special Master: And you take credit for the dividends on that same stock?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir; and we say we are to be charged for the stocks only what we got them for in 1863.

The Special Master: That is a question of amount, but it is a question whether these dividends were predicated upon the stock as to which investments were made, charged against West Virginia in the schedule. That is right, is it?

Mr. McClintic: Yes.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. I noticed that as a part of your statement of receipts by Virginia from the counties of West Virginia, you have included $153,475 of toll on a mileage basis from the Northwestern turnpike? 659

A. Yes.

The Special Master: Are those the same roads as to which charges are made in some parts of the schedule?

Mr. McClintic: If your Honor please, you asked us yesterday why the northwestern turnpike road had so much more charged to it by West Virginia than Virginia charged. That is practically the difference. Those tolls were paid back on the road, and we charged it.

The Special Master: You took the tolls into account?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: And they did not take them into account either way?

Mr. McClintic: No, sir.

The Special Master: You gave credit for a larger charge, and here you seek to get allowance for the tolls?

Mr. McClintic: These tolls were spent on the road just as they were collected. They were immediately put back on the road, and as we understood it were chargeable as a part of the money that went into the road, but we claim credit for it, because we paid it.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. Explain one of the items you have in that schedule under the head of "bonus received from banks within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia, paid into the treasury out of dividends, being a tax on charter privileges, $96,000."

The Special Master: Is that the franchise tax we have heard about?

Mr. Harrison: That may be. 660

The Special Master: Is it, I say?

A. Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Or the charge for the privilege of exercising the franchise?

A. Yes, sir; that is what it was.

Mr. Anderson: The State charged that to grant a charter to the bank?

A. And a certain amount for refunding. It was a tax on the charter privilege.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. Was that contributed by any of the counties of West Virginia?

A. So it says—within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia.

Q. But the decree requires you to render a statement of all moneys paid into the Treasury from the counties?

A. Yes, sir; from the counties.

Q. Did that come from any counties in West Virginia?

A. Certainly.

Q. What counties did it come from?

A. Wherever the bank was located.

Q. You construe that as coming from the county because the situs of the bank was in a particular county?

A. That is it.

Q. You testified when we were on paragraph 3 of the decree, in relation to the expenditures of money by Virginia in West Virginia, that you did not consider it money expended by Virginia in West Virginia where she subscribed to the stock of a joint 661 stock company located in that State?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. I understand you to say now that when that same company paid a dividend to Virginia on the stock so subscribed for, you do consider that a payment by a West Virginia county to the Treasury of Virginia?

A. It is included in that schedule.

Q. How do you reconcile that logic?

A. I think it is not difficult of reconciliation. Where money is subscribed to a stock company, paid out of the Treasury here for a subscription to stock, and stock taken for it and held in the treasury, it can hardly be construed as an expenditure within the counties that now form West Virginia, as I understand it, while the money paid from dividends came indirectly from those counties that form West Virginia.

Q. The money paid on the stock which you do not consider an expenditure in West Virginia, is, however a contribution from the county where the company is located to the Treasury of Virginia?

A. As a matter of fact: yes.

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1909. Re-Direct Examination of T. B. Dixey.]

[Mr. McClintic:]

Q. Jumping from the first exhibit to No. F-1. No. 6, in reference to payment of counties, were there any moneys paid into Virginia by a county as a county? 694

The Special Master: You mean as a municipal organization?

Mr. McClintic: As a county or organization of any character. Were not all the funds paid in paid by individuals?

A. A State depository; is that what you mean?

Q. No; Mr. Harrison asked you about the counties paying in money. Did any county ever pay anything as a county, in any instance?

A. I will not say in any instance. I do not think I understand the scope of your question.

Q. The question is—

The Special Master: Did the money that appears to have been paid to the State of Virginia by West Virginia come from the county treasuries, in any case, or did it come from institutions or organizations within the territory. Is not that the question?

Mr. McClintic: No; what I want to get at is this. Mr. Harrison seems to think that that decree meant that in order to get credit from the county it must be paid by the county as a county, and I ask him if these taxes were not levied by State authority and directly paid by the individuals to the agent of the State, for 695 the State?

The Special Master: Without going through the county treasury?

Mr. McClintic: Without going through any county.

The Special Master: Or having any official mark.

Mr. McClintic: Any official mark of the county.

The Witness: No, sir; not in that sense.

The Special Master: What is your answer?

The Witness: Originally the books showed the county from which the money was paid, such and such a county; the clerk of such and such a county.

The Special Master: Let us see what the entries did show.

The Witness: The books show the county in which these payments originated, the original books of entry. I do not recall, without reference to the books, whether they show them as direct payments into the Treasury from the County official as an official act of that official or not. I do not remember about that. That is made clear on the books, perhaps, but I do not remember about that. But the books do show the county in which the receipt originated, or the disbursement was made.

Mr. Mollohan: It was fixed by statute. The sheriff took the tax ticket. There was the same levy over the State. This land book would go into the hands of the sheriff. He made the tickets out and collected in each county and then transmitted it to the Treasurer here.

The Special Master: If the statute shows it, it is easy 696 to develop it.

The Witness: It shows receipts by clerks of county courts, and that sort of thing.

The Special Master: The county paid nothing except her own revenue, and she spent her own revenue?

Mr. Mollohan: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Is there anything in the way of re-cross examination? There does not seem to be anything else. Call your next witness.

[Vol. 7. July 1, 1909. Plaintiff's Substitute Exhibit F-1.]

[The Special Master]:

Now, we come to the sixth paragraph, plaintiff's exhibit F-1. 866
(Reading from decree):

"All moneys paid into the Treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the State of West Virginia during the period prior to the admission of the latter State into the Union."

You submit Plaintiff's Substitute Exhibit F-1?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Do the parties agree upon the items stated in Plaintiff's Substitute Exhibit F-1?

Mr. Harrison: I think we are in accord on the items. It is only a question of inclusion or exclusion.

Mr. Dixey: No, sir; not entirely. I would like to have that put in the class with C-1, and Mr. Potter and I will take it up. It is only a matter of a few hours, I think.

[Vol. 7. July 2, 1909.]

The Special Master: Let me make this one inquiry. There 1017 are some reconcilings to be done by the experts, and that is disposed of, because we all agree that we will take what they agree upon. Has Virginia submitted everything they are now prepared to submit on all the paragraphs?

Mr. Harrison: We left No. 6 open—

The Special Master: Between the experts— 1018

Mr. Harrison: Yes, I think so.

The Special Master: If they are not able to report, we will take their report later.

Mr. Dixcy: There is no difference whatever.

Mr. Anderson: They accept Virginia's Schedule as to the amounts.

The Special Master: As I understand it now, so far as Virginia is concerned, they have nothing further to submit on any of these paragraphs.

Mr. Harrison: One moment. Mr. Potter made a slight correction in that schedule of the receipts for West Virginia, and here is where it appears. This is reconciling it.

The Special Master: Did you go over that with Mr. Dixcy?

Mr. Potter: Yes, sir; every item.

Mr. Harrison: There are only one or two immaterial items.

The Special Master: Let Mr. Dixcy and Mr. Potter sign it and hand it to the stenographer.

TESTIMONY ON BEHALF OF THE COMPLAINANT.
under Paragraph 7 of the Decree.

79

ARTHUR G. POTTER,
testified as follows:

Mr. Anderson: The statements we have filed in response to the seventh paragraph of the decree are necessarily incomplete, and to some extent tentative. There are certain facts we had hoped to be able to ascertain upon examination of records in West Virginia, where I went personally, accompanied by Mr. Potter and Mr. Robinson and Mr. Lightfoot, and they made careful investigations there. The officials of West Virginia turned over to us all the records which were accessible or which could be found in the State library and in the public offices of the government of West Virginia at Charleston; but the first General Assembly of the Government of West Virginia at Wheeling authorized Governor Pierpont to turn these records over to the new Governor of West Virginia, upon the understanding that whenever called for by Virginia, they were to be returned to Virginia. They have not been returned, and until they are returned we cannot make complete answers to this direction of the decree. I want to say, however, that it is not so important to have these records as it was at one time believed to be. We can file this statement with the understanding that it is tentative and incomplete.

The Special Master: Then as I understand, you offer Plaintiff's Exhibit G-1 with the understanding that you may later desire to supplement it with more complete proof of the Plaintiff's case under that item?

Mr. Spooner: If it cannot be supplemented, it is not good, is it?

Mr. Anderson: We want to make additions to it, that is all. We will lose if we are not able to do it.

The Special Master: That is, in presenting this, you do not wish to be understood as conceding that this is all that you are entitled to recover on that branch of the case, but you reserve the right to put in additional evidence if you are able to obtain it?

Mr. Anderson: If we are able to obtain it.

The Special Master: I see no objection to that.

[See in testimony under Paragraph 2, at page —— of this volume, reference to matter following through indented page 81.]

By Mr. Spooner:

Q. Did you ascertain, during the progress of your investigation, the number of square miles in the Commonwealth of Virginia in 1861?

A. We took that from the report of the Auditor of Public Accounts.

Q. What did you ascertain to be the area in square miles of Virginia in 1861?

A. It is shown in that Schedule No. 2—number of square miles in Virginia, 48,951.

Q. Oh, no; not in 1861. I mean the area of Virginia before she was divided.

A. Before she was divided? Total, 94,488 square miles.

Mr. Anderson: I think that is excessive, but that was the estimate. I suppose it was reached, Senator, by reason of the fact that —

By Mr. Spooner:

Q. Where did you get that? 81

A. From the auditor's report of 1861.

By the Special Master:

Q. What is that; the report giving the list of counties in detail and the area of each county?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You took the county items and made the aggregate?

A. As per the certificate of the County Surveyors.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. That was in the Auditor's report of the State of Virginia for 1861?

A. I believe the book is marked, "Reports of 1861."

Q. And that information in detail is given by the Auditor in that report?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. By counties?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. Spooner:

Q. Vacant lands that were assessed?

A. I paid no attention to vacant lands that were assessed.

Mr. Anderson: If he had, Senator, it would have been a great deal larger, in all probability, because the same tract of land was sometimes assessed three or four times.

The Special Master: Anything further, Mr. Anderson?

By Mr. Anderson:

Q. State what you know about this statement, "Plaintiff's Exhibit G-1." From what sources was that information compiled.

The Special Master: That is, what were the original sources of your information? 82

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

A. With respect to schedules 1, 2 and 3 under this article, the information was taken from the Auditor's reports of West Virginia, consulted in the library at Charleston. The schedules here show the source of the information.

Q. What are the facts as to the correctness of that statement, as far as it goes, and so far as it comes within your knowledge?

A. The various figures that I have taken off are merely copies from those books. I do not know anything about the accuracy of them, because there was no opportunity for verifying them. I merely know the copies are right, to the best of my knowledge and belief.

Q. They are copies of the public reports of the Auditor of West Virginia?

A. Yes, sir.

The Special Master: File that, please, and let it be marked by the stenographer.

(The paper referred to, entitled "Commonwealth of Virginia vs. State of West Virginia. Summary of Property, Stocks and Credits received by West Virginia under Article VII," is filed herewith, marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit G-1.")

Mr. Harrison: Do you gentlemen want to examine Mr. Potter about this exhibit?

By the Special Master:

Q. Can you state where you got the information in Schedule 5—stock in the Merchants & Mechanics Bank of Wheeling? 83

A. The last page shows that under Section 20 of the Act of March 7, 1834, the Commonwealth of Virginia received from the Merchants & Mechanics Bank of Wheeling a stock bonus amounting to $40,000.

Q. Then you got that from an act of the Legislature?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Spooner: Have you detailed statements to support this exhibit G 1?

Mr. Robinson: We have no details to support that?

Mr. Spooner: Why not?

A. This contains all the detail we could find.

Mr. Robinson: That is all the detail we have.

The Special Master: As I understand Mr. Potter, he found the items upon which he predicates items 1, 2 and 3 in the public reports of West Virginia, and he took those items and assumed them to be correct.

By Mr. Spooner:

Q. Will you indicate the reports where you got that information?

A. The introductory paragraph of this first schedule, Schedule 1, says:

"In a letter in 'Auditor's reports, House Journal 1862-3,' dated Wheeling, July 14th, 1863, from S. P. Hildreth, Treasurer, to Governor Pierpont, he reports having made an examination of what we take to be the books of the Restored State.

The second one also refers to that. The third one refers to a number of annual reports, giving the table and page number 84 in the annual reports of the Auditor of West Virginia as far up as 1872. It has to do with arrears of taxes.

[Vol. 5. May 6, 1909. Cross Examination of A. G. Potter.]

[By Mr. McClintic]: The next schedule is 7—

The Special Master: Plaintiff's Exhibit G-1.

Q. (Continuing): G-1; No. 7 of the decree. The charge in that schedule, Mr. Potter, $225,279.83 received by West Virginia. What evidence did you have that West Virginia received any such sum?

The Special Master: That is on page one.

Mr. McClintic: Yes.

A .The auditor's report of the house journal 1862-3, dated Wheeling, July 14, 1863.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. What auditor?

A. I have not the name of the auditor here. I think the report was by Treasurer Hildreth.

Q. Of what state was Mr. Hildreth the treasurer? 384

A. I don't know whether it was the restored state or West Virginia.

The Special Master: What did he say—that he was the treasurer of the Pierpont Government?

Mr. McClintic: I think so.

The Special Master: This schedule does not contain the date. What was that item?

The Witness: On page 2 that is given.

The Special Master: You have your schedules all paged correctly now, have you not?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: So we can refer now to the new pages?

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Was not that sum taken by you from a letter written by S. P. Hildreth to Governor F. H. Pierpont, July 14, 1863?

A. Yes, a copy of the letter as the schedule states. In the letter above referred to is the following paragraph, and then it goes on to state the amount of money received and disbursed.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. Read the paragraph.

A. "In a letter in auditor's report House Journal 1862, line 3, dated Wheeling, July 14, 1863, from S. P. Hildreth, Treasurer, to Governor Pierpont, he reports having made an examination of what we took to be the books of the restored State."

In that letter above referred to is the following paragraph: 385

"In this same journal we find the amount in the Treasury on the 1st of October, 1862, to have been $120,159.01; received to June 19, 1863, $252,529.71; making a total of cash to be accounted for $372,688.72. Out of which there was paid $147,408.89. Leaving a balance in the Treasury June 20, 1863, of $225,279.83."

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. In what part of that letter did you find those words, "Making the total of cash to be accounted for?"

A. I introduced that.

Q. Were you not starting out to read what the letter purported to say?

A. The figures show that there is that charge to be accounted for.

Q. Did you not start out, in answer to a question a moment ago, to read the paragraph?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And did you not interpolate some language of your own in reading it?

A. Yes, sir; but you had a copy of the report before you.

Q. You were doing that in answer to a question of Mr. Harrison, were you not?

A. Yes, sir, I believe so.

Q. What evidence have you that West Virginia got that $225,279.83?

A. None whatever.

The Special Master: What does this indicate; that it was in the Treasury of the Pierpont Government or in the Treasury of some other government?

The Witness: That the Government of West Virginia took 386
it over from the restored government.

Mr. McClintic: How did it indicate that?

Mr. Anderson: That is rather a matter of argument.

Mr. McClintic: No, it is not; it is a matter of fact.

The Special Master: How would it do to inquire whether there is anything in the letter that is indicative of the place where the money went except the extract he quotes. What is the fact about that? Excuse me for making the suggestion?

The Witness: There is nothing—

By the Special Master:

Q. Have you given all of the letter that tends to indicate where the money was and where the money went?

A. Yes; that was my intention.

Q. And so, wherever it was, it was simply a matter of construction from this?

Mr. Anderson: Will you read your note at the bottom of the page, page 2?

The Witness (apparently reading): Governor Boreman's message of July 23, 1863, says the report of Hildreth shows a balance in the Treasury of June 19, 1863, which is to be transferred to this State under the provisions of an act of the General Assembly, passed February 4, 1863. See page 6, Volume 1; Virginia vs. West Virginia reports.

The Special Master: Of what State was Boreman Governor?

Mr. Harrison: He was the first Governor of West Virginia.

The Special Master: So far as the letter is concerned, the 387 extract shows everything that the letter discloses?

Mr. Harrison: Yes.

The Special Master: And then you supplement it by this extract from the Governor's message?

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Then you have no other evidence than the message by Boreman and this letter—which message of Boreman says there was so much in the Treasury on the 19th of June, 1863, meaning the Treasury of Virginia, which was to be transferred?

A. That is all.

Q. You have no evidence that it was transferred in any way?

A. None whatever.

Q. In schedule 2, mentioned on page 1, and also page 3, you charge West Virginia with $9,937.86. On what basis do you make that charge?

A. From information read out of the same letter just referred to, in a published report found in Charleston.

Q. Have you any evidence that that money was ever transferred to West Virginia?

A. None whatever.

Q. Have you any evidence that that money was ever in the Treasury at any time?

A. No, sir.

Q. You make a charge on schedule 3 of $1,343.80. The schedule is on page 4. Where did you get that information?

A. The auditor's reports of 1861-70; 1871-76. 388

Q. The auditor's reports of what state?

A. The state of West Virginia.

Q. You do not mean the auditor's report of the State of West Virginia of 1861?

A. Yes; the book was marked "Auditor's report 1861-70" on the back of the book.

Q. You simply mean they were bound together?

A. That is all. The first year was 1862, the year ending 1862, as shown in the schedule, table C, page No. 7.

Q. Why do you charge West Virginia with anything received in 1862?

A. We have not done so under this schedule.

Q. I understand you to say so.

A. I said the first report mentioned in that book was marked 1861-70, the report of September 30, 1862.

Q. Whose report?

A. The Auditor's.

Q. Of what state?

The Special Master: What auditor?

Mr. Anderson: The Pierpont Government, I suppose.

A. I have not that name.

Mr. Carlisle: What state was he auditor of?

The Special Master: Tell us whether he represented Virginia or West Virginia?

The Witness: The restored government. I am not so familiar with the personnel of that Governmental force up there as some of you gentlemen are.

Mr. Harrison: Where did you find the book you referred to? 389

A. In the State Library in Charleston, West Virginia.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. On the schedule marked page 1, stock in Merchants and Mechanics Bank, Wheeling, $40,000. Please explain what that charge was for.

A. I would like to explain that that item was entered under a misapprehension. I had a memorandum when I came down here at the first hearing to investigaate that, and it was not my understanding that that entire schedule was to be introduced as evidence; but it was introduced, and I overlooked the matter of looking up that particular item. I have since found that those shares were sold by the Sinking Fund in 1857, and we would therefore like to withdraw that item from the schedule.

Q. Did the State pay any money for that stock?

A. I believe it was a stock bonus.

Q. You mean it was given to the State under an act of the legislature?

A. Providing for something in the way of a franchise tax, I presume.

The Special Master: Is it conceded on the part of counsel for the plaintiff that that item shall go out?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir; that item goes out.

Mr. Harrison: I understand, Mr. Potter, that this schedule 7 was put in—

The Special Master: Plaintiff's Exhibit G-1—

Mr. Harrison: Was put in before you had fully completed your investigation of the bank stock item referred to?

The Witness: Yes, sir. 390

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Did you look at the item of the Northwestern bank in reference to the item which you marked "not on annual report?"

A. I have not had time to investigate that?

The Special Master: Do you wish him to investigate that?

Mr. McClintic: Yes; I asked him to do so.

The Special Master: We might suspend, then, with this witness, and go on with some other witness.

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1909. Direct Examination of T. B. Dixcy.]

Mr. McClintic: We now offer Defendant's Exhibit G-1. 568

The Special Master: That is offered and received.

(The exhibit referred to is marked Defendant's Exhibit G-1.)

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Please state if that exhibit was made under your direction and signed by you?

A. That exhibit was made under my direction and is correct, in regard to such items as are included thereunder, as qualified by the caption; and it is signed by me.

Q. On page 2, the first item, total turnpikes, roads, etc., $700,103.49. Please explain what you mean by that?

A. Those were the total amounts in regard to that particular item which the State had invested in the stock of turnpikes and roads lying wholly in the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia. It was the original and full amount of the investment of the State.

Q. That is the purchase of stock in various companies by the State of Virginia?

A. Yes; incorporated companies.

By the Special Master:

Q. When you say total cost, do you mean that is the total capital of the stock?

A. No, sir; not exactly.

Q. You mean that is the aggregate expenditure of the State in the stock of that company?

A. Yes, sir. 569

Mr. McClintic: That class of company, there were a hundred or more of them.

The Special Master: Oh, yes.

The Witness: The State subscription was first two-fifths and then three-fifths. That was the usual subscription to the capital stock of these various companies.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Take the next item, navigation companies, $210,500. Please explain that.

A. The same applies to that. That was the amount that the State paid. I may say that there were sometimes differences between the amount paid and the amount subscribed. This is the amount actually paid in by the State for the capital stock which it purchased, in these incorporated navigation companies, the navigation companies being devoted to the improvement of rivers.

The Special Master: Do you say that as a rule the investment of the State was two-fifths?

The Witness. Yes, sir. In the early part of the period in some instances it was one-fifth, usually two-fifths and later three-fifths.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. On Plaintiff's Exhibit C-1 there is charged an item, Monongalia, $8,180.

Mr. Anderson: What page is that?

Mr. McClintic: Page 11. Please state if you admitted to your account an item, 1822, $5,520.

The Special Master: That is prior to the beginning of his 570 account, is it not?

Mr. McClintic: Yes.

By the Special Master:

Q. Then I may assume that every item that appears on the schedules presented by the plaintiff that antedates March 19, 1823, is not included in the statements made by Mr. Dixey?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That statement covers the whole series of exhibits and schedules?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Look on page 2 of Defendant's Exhibit G-1 and explain the item Bridge Companies, $78,412.50.

A. On page 2?

Q. Yes.

A. Those were incorporated bridge companies, and that amount is the amount that the State paid for its stock purchased by it in those incorporated bridge companies.

Mr. Spooner: When you say purchased, do you mean subscribed for?

The Witness: Paid; that is, the actual payment by the State. It does not agree in all cases with the subscription.

By the Special Master:

Q. Does the amount paid in any instance exceed the subscription?

A. I recall no such instance.

Q. But in some cases the amount subscribed exceeded the amount paid in?

A. Yes, sir. The payments were made proportionately. 571
When the public paid in so much, the State paid in so much; and sometimes the whole amount was not paid in.

Q. The inference is that when the State did not pay the full amount of the subscription, the public did not pay the full amount?

A. That is the inference.

Q. That is, it was a pro rata payment all around?

A. Usually, yes.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. The next item is in regard to interstate roads between and in the the territory now constituting the Commonwealth of Virginia and the State of West Virginia; $114,652.84. Please explain that?

A. That amount is the amount paid by the State for its subscription to the capital stock of the Interstate turnpike and roads.

By the Special Master:

Q. That is, the turnpikes leading from one state to another?

A. Yes, built by an incorporated company.

Q. Have you any computation that would apportion that payment to the respective distances that the roads would extend in either State?

A. We have the mileage in the two states figured out in every case. That would not always be necessarily a fair method of apportionment, however. Portions of the road might be more difficult to build than other portions.

Q. That, of course, would be arbitrary.

A. I may say, sir, that those mileages are shown on the details of this exhibit in this report.

Q. Are those facts worked out? 572

A. They have not been applied to the amount spent.

Mr. McClintic: We expect to prove that fact later. The next is $25,000—

The Special Master: I was going to say that all these facts would be admissible. I cannot tell in advance what theory I am going to adopt. I have to have all the facts before me and then reach a conclusion.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. That item on page 2; please state, if you know, the facts in relation to that.

A. That is an amount paid to the town of Bath.

The Special Master: Do you understand that it represents an indebtedness to the town of Bath by the State?

The Witness: The inception was it was a loan to the town of Bath.

The Special Master: And so far as you have discovered, it indicates the indebtedness of the town of Bath to the Commonwealth?

The Witness: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: And what has been done with it the books do not disclose.

The Witness: They do not, no, sir.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. The next item, Northwestern Bank of Virginia, at Wheeling, $341,800. Please turn to that exhibit. Page 9, on the same exhibit; explain that amount and what you mean by that amount, $341,800.

A. The amount is the par value of the stock held by the Commonwealth and Literary Fund of the State of Virginia in 573 the Northwestern Bank of Virginia, which was located at Wheeling. The Commonwealth Fund originally held 4,000 shares, on which they paid $375,091.33 in cash, and the balance of $400,000, amounting to $24,908.67 in dividends and interest accumulated. The amount held by the Literary Fund, 500 shares, was purchased in 1832, so that the total amount was Northwestern Bank stock held January 1st, 1861, was 34,018 shares, with a par value of $341,800, excluding 326 shares held by the Board of Public Works, and which were received as bonus stock without cost to the State.

Q. That bonus stock, you mean, is in the nature of a franchise tax?

A. Yes.

Q. And those 326 shares were based on that?

A. Yes.

Q. I notice you say that in 1857 the Commonwealth sold 1082 shares. That is shown by the books of Virginia?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. So it was shown by the books that the number of shares held by the State of Virginia in the Northwestern Bank was 3418, as of January 1st, 1861, I believe?

A. Held by the Commonwealth and Literary Fund, yes, sir.

Q. Well, that is the same as the state.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many branches, if you know, from the Acts, did the Northwestern bank have, and where were they situated?

A. I prefer not to testify on that from memory. The record 574 shows.

Q. Please explain the item Fairmont Bank, Marion County, $50,000, which is also on page 9 of the exhibit?

A. That was the amount of subscription of the State for 1,000 shares purchased in 1860; 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the Fairmont bank in Marion County.

Q. And the par value of those shares was $50?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the par value of the shares of the Northwestern Bank was $100, was it?

A. Yes; $100.

Q. On page 2 we find James River and Kanawha Company, $9,542,004.30. Please explain why that was included in that form and what it is.

A. That is shown in detail on pages 10 and 11 of the Exhibit.

Q. On pages 10 and 11 of the complete details?

A. Yes. Do you wish me to go over it in full?

Q. No, unless somebody else wants it; I don't care for it. That sum, $9,542,004.30, represents what?

A. That sum represents the total cash outlay for the Commonwealth of the stock of the James River and Kanawha Company, which it owned.

Q. On the 1st day of January, 1861, what was the relation of the State of Virginia to this company, as to the amount of stock held?

A. It held 104,000 shares, of the par value of $10,400,000.

The Special Master: You get that from the aggregate of 575 72,000 and 32,000 on page 11?

The Witness: Yes, sir; shown in the recapitulation on page 11.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Was the James River and Kanawha Company indebted to the State of Virginia the 1st of January, 1861, in any sum that you remember or did you examine into the details of that?

A. I don't remember that sufficiently to testify from memory. I may ask you whether you mean in addition to the amount represented by capital stock?

Q. Yes.

A. I don't remember the amount sufficiently to tell that.

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1909. Cross Examination of T. B. Dixcy.]

Q. Now, dealing with your Exhibit G-1, which is responsive 661 to paragraph 7 of the decree, will you please look at that for a moment, Mr. Dixcy?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. On page 1 of that exhibit you say "Appended hereto is a 662 statement of such property as was received by West Virginia and which has not been included in any schedule heretofore prepared and rendered." Now, turning to the next page we find an itemized list of property, footing up $11,079,973.19. Is that the list referred to in the certificate on page 1?

A. That is not the list. That is the property. The footings are not referred to on page 1. It simply refers to the property received. That is the total cost, the money expended for those. Those are still to be valued.

By the Special Master:

Q. That is the summary of the cost of the property, is it?

A. Yes, sir; I have not assumed to put any value on those.

Q. That is, what you have on page 2 is a summary of the cost of the property referred to in the certificate on page 1. Is that right?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. My question is, do you state that the property listed there was received by West Virginia?

A. I understand that it was constructively received; yes, sir. These are practically all stocks. Now, I don't understand that the stock certificates were delivered to West Virginia.

Q. Where did you get your understanding from?

A. From that section of the decree. 663

Q. I do not see how you could get it from that.

A. If you will make your meaning a little plainer—

The Special Master: The understanding he is asking you for, as I understand it, is where you get your understanding that all the stock was not delivered to West Virginia. He wants to know where you got that information.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. Where did you get your understanding that that was constructively held by West Virginia?

A. Well, I have been so advised.

Q. By whom?

A. I know that an amount of the stock of these old Companies was never actually delivered to West Virginia.

Q. Did you get your information from the public records of Virginia?

A. The stock is in the Treasurer's office at this minute of a great many of these companies.

Q. That is not an answer to my question. You have said just now that you had an understanding that this list of stock was constructively delivered to West Virginia?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. I ask you where you got that understanding. If you will answer the question, I will be obliged to you?

A. I think I cannot say I have been actually so instructed by counsel, but I have received that impression from counsel in conversation, in talking this matter over. I certainly did not evolve it myself.

Q. Then when you speak of your understanding on that subject, you refer to the impressions you have received from 664 counsel?

A. I think from counsel; yes, sir. It is a very definite impression on my mind. I cannot locate it absolutely.

By the Special Master:

Q. To what extent did you find the original stock on file?

A. I have not made any attempt to go through it. There were hundreds and hundreds of certificates down there, and they don't know what they have got themselves.

Q. In whose name?

A. I don't even know that. I have only seen a very few certificates.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. It is impossible for you to tell whether it is West Virginia's stock or Virginia's stock or any other stock?

A. Well, this list, of course, was prepared under instruction of counsel.

Q. The thing I was inquiring about now was the particular matter the stock certificates.

A. I don't actually know. No actual investigation has been made to see just what stock certificates are down there.

Q. You say investigation has been made?

A. Has not been made, on our part.

Q. You have an item of $9,542,004.30 of stocks of the James River and Kanawha Company?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Which, according to your statement, is constructively held by West Virginia? 365

Mr. McClintic: No, sir; he never made any such statement.

A. No, sir.

Mr. Harrison: That is the explanation he had given?

A. It does not say so. There is the schedule.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. Just wait one moment. Let us see what it says. You have just stated that was a list of property certified as having been received by West Virginia, and when I asked you how you knew it was received by West Virginia you said your understanding was it had been constructively received by her, and then what you meant by that was that you had derived that impression from counsel. Now, I ask you if I am to understand that that $9,000,000 of stock of the James River and Kanawha Company was constructively received?

A. I think I can make a more definite answer than I have made.

Q. Just answer my question. Then you can make just as definite a one as you choose. I say does that mean, according to your testimony, that $9,000,000 of the stock of the James River and Kanawha Company was constructively received by West Virginia?

A. Certainly not.

Q. Now, what do you mean by your caption. Let me read your caption to you and then you may answer my question. What do you mean by this caption: "Summary of the property received by the State of West Virginia; not embraced in any preceding schedule?" What do you mean by that. Is that true, or does it mean something else than it states?

A. No; that is copied from paragraph 7 of the decree.

By the Special Master:

Q. How did you come to include these items under that heading?

A. May I explain?

Q. Yes, certainly.

A. I understood paragraph 7, and I have been so advised, to cover the property that passed under the act of February 3, 1863, and I have understood that all the stock of the companies incorporated in this State, in which West Virginia had any interest, passed under that act; and this schedule is supposed to represent the property that was passed.

Q. Were you not instructed by counsel to include these items under that heading?

A. That is true.

Q. You were instructed by your counsel to include the items under that heading?

A. To include the items under this heading; yes, sir, but that is not the question Mr. Harrison asked. That is included.

The Special Master: Is there any question raised about that, about the accuracy of the statement?

Mr. McClintic: The heading is a trifle misleading, as it was put there, your Honor. I never paid any attention to it whatever. The instructions of counsel were that all items of stocks should go under what we call G-1, clause 7, and in the reference to the 667
James River and Kanawha Company, Mr. Dixey, instead of making a division, simply put the whole stock down here and put the facts down and left it to us to decide the question. We did not see this exhibit until last Monday, and we did not think it worth while to change it afterwards, as it was susceptible of explanation.

The Special Master: As it stands, it is obvious what inference might be drawn from it.

Mr. McClintic: West Virginia, of course, never received that stock of the James River and Kanawha Company, because there is only a small item of that in West Virginia. The balance is in Virginia, and that is misleading. As to the turnpikes and roads that extended across the line, West Virginia received stock for such portions of the roads as were in West Virginia, and did not receive stock for such portions as were in Virginia.

The Special Master: Both parties must appreciate that these schedules are here before me, and I am quite likely to take them for what they state. They must take such action in relation to the schedules, so far as they do not state what they appear to state, as they are advised the rights and interests of their respective clients require. Do I make myself clear about that?

Mr. Spooner: I did not hear your honor.

The Special Master: These schedules all come here before me, and I take the statements that appear on them as true. If the statements are not in accordance with the ideas of counsel in relation to them, they must take such action in relation to the schedules 668 on either side as they are advised the interests of their clients require.

Mr. Spooner: That shall be done, but the subject had not been brought to my attention.

The Special Master: You appreciate their significance, so far as I am concerned. I take these statements as made by the accountants on either side as practically the admissions and declarations of the parties. If they do not accurately state the ideas of the parties, of course the counsel on either side must be careful to see that they must protect the rights of their clients in connection with the statements with which they do not agree, as they may be advised the interests of their clients require.

Mr. Spooner: It is a question as to the construction of the receipt. That is a question of law. I supposed this was an exhibit containing a list of the stocks.

The Special Master: All you are doing at present is to get the facts presented before me, and as the facts appear, of course you predicate your legal propositions thereon; but a clean statement of what the thing is, unless it is explained in some way, of course will go with me. I cannot take any other course in relation to it.

Mr. Spooner: I suppose the real facts are the important thing, and not a mere headline.

The Special Master: Certainly; but in the absence of a fact that counter indicates a headline, the headline goes with me.

Mr. Spooner: Certainly. 669

The Special Master: I shall not take this and go digging. down to evade headlines. If the attorneys have something that counter indicates a headline, I will read it.

Mr. Spooner: We will try and relieve you of any such labor.

The Special Master: In the absence of explanation or suggestion, the headline will stand.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. Did you visit West Virginia in the progress of this investigation?

A. I have been to West Virginia; yes, sir.

Q. I did not ask you whether you have been to West Virginia.

A. I have been to West Virginia in the progress of this investigation; yes, sir.

Q. Did you go there for the purpose of conducting an examination of her records?

A. I did not myself go there for that purpose. I sent two representatives over there to make the investigation.

Q. Who were they?

A. Do you want the names?

Q. Yes.

A. Mr. D. E. Balsley and Mr. L. A. Petty.

Q. Then you, yourself, took no part in the investigation of the records in West Virginia?

A. Not of the investigation of the records in West Virginia; no, sir.

Q. Were the two gentlemen you have mentioned just now as having investigated your employes?

A. Yes, sir; Mr. Balsley is my employee. 670

Q. How about the other man?

A. Mr. Petty is employed by the State of West Virginia, under my direction.

By the Special Master:

Q. They are all employed in the common work, I suppose?

A. Yes, sir; he went to assist Mr. Balsley, and do whatever Mr. Balsley told him to do.

Q. He simply was not part of your force?

A. He was not, so far as my pay roll goes.

Q. But he was co-operating with your people?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. Do you know what records they examined?

A. Do I know what records they examined?

Q. Yes.

A. Yes, sir; they examined those records that were examined by the representatives of Virginia.

Q. Did they examine the journals sheriff's accounts, license books, and the books of the railroad, banks and express and insurance companies of the restored State of Virginia which are referred to in the letter of treasurer Hildreth, of July 14, 1863?

A. They examined the document in which that letter is.

Q. Now I ask you if they examined the documents referred to in that letter?

A. Will you kindly read the letter. 671

The Special Master: Call attention to the documents.

Mr. Harrison: I do not want to read the whole letter. The letter refers to the documents I have mentioned. It refers to the following books: The Journal, Sheriff's accounts, license books, and the books of the railroads, banks, express and insurance companies.

A. The books of the railroads?

Q. Yes.

A. Certainly no such investigation was made.

Q. Or the registry, I believe it was, of banks and insurance companies?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did they examine any of those documents or books referred to in that letter?

A. No, sir.

Q. How do you know?

A. I know because I know what they examined.

Q. Were you there when they examined?

A. No, sir.

Q. You did not see them examined?

A. No, sir.

Q. How do you know what they examined?

A. Because they examined and made a report and brought it back with them. The book that contains the report that is quoted from in Virginia's Exhibit—they examined that book and brought it back here to Virginia with them, and copies were made of that and we have them in our papers here.

Q. Is that your only reason for saying that you know they 672 did not examine the documents referred to in that book?

A. It was not reported to me that they did, and if they had it would have been so reported; and for the further reason that they do not exist.

Q. How do you know they do not exist?

A. I think Virginia has so stated.

Q. Is that your only reason for saying so?

A. I accepted that statement.

The Special Master: Who said so?

Mr. Harrison: Virginia, he says.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. You do not know, then?

A. Not of my own knowledge, no, sir; not by any search I have made, I don't know.

The Special Master: You say Virginia so stated. Who do you mean?

A. I say that is my impression.

Mr. McClintic: If the Court please, I forgot to call the attention of these gentlemen to the fact that some time in the month of April I did find in the vault of the Treasury of West Virginia a book which had in it certain memoranda of the restored government, and you might term it, I presume, accounts. I do not know whether to call it a journal or what. I also found another book which contained other memoranda, both of which are here, and both of which we are ready to give to them any time they want them. I had forgotten it up to this time.

Mr. Harrison: We would like to have them.

The Special Master: Do those books contain anything 673 material?

Mr. McClintic: They contain certain receipts and disbursements of the restored Government of Virginia, beginning, I think, sometime in 1861 or 1862. I don't remember the exact date. I brought them over here a short time ago.

Mr. Conrad: There are three books referred to in several of the State papers connected with that Government, and the Statement is made in one those papers that one of the books will be deposited here in the archives of this State. We have made search for nearly two years for those three books.

Mr. McClintic: I will state further that when General Anderson and Mr. Potter and others were there last October I had never seen or heard of those books. I went with them to the State officers and also with Mr. Lewis, who had been there longer than any of the others, and they said there were no such books. About three weeks ago—I do not remember just when, sometime in the month of April—I was in the Treasurer's office one day, and I saw an old clerk of the treasurer's office in there. I said, "Did you ever find any books, so and so?" He made a search in the vault and said, "Here are a couple of old books, which you might be looking for." At that time I did not look at them, but a few days afterwards I did go back and look at those books, when I got time to do so, and I brought them over here. The gentlemen can have them any time they went them.

Mr. Harrison: Mr. McClintic, when did you say you dis- 674 covered those books?

Mr. McClintic: Sometime in the month of April.

Mr. Harrison: Of this year?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

Mr. Harrison: And they are here, and we can have access to them?

Mr. McClintic: Yes; you can have them at any time you want them.

The Witness: Mr. McClintic, may I interrupt you a moment. In thinking this matter over at this minute, I think Mr. Balsley was not the man who made the examination. I think it was Mr. J. C. Pybas. Mr. Balsley was engaged on some other examinations, I think. I was confused.

Q. Did you learn anything in the course of your examination and investigation into this matter of an item appearing in statement F, filed with the report of Jackson, Bennett and Campbell, and exhibited by counsel for West Virginia in this record, showing $539,000 of stock of Virginia in West Virginia banks, received by West Virginia?

A. It is in your Exhibit F?

Q. No; I say filed by counsel for West Virginia.

Mr. McClintic: You mean the Bennett report?

Mr. Harrison: Yes, the Bennett, Jackson and Campbell report.

Mr. McClintic: I do not think Mr. Dixey has ever investigated the Bennett report.

Mr. Harrison: Let him answer the question.

A. I am not entirely sure what you are talking about. 675

Mr. Conrad: Let him see that report. Here is a report filed by the counsel for West Virginia.

Mr. McClintic: No; it is not filed anywhere.

A. I know nothing of that. I have seen that book. I have that book

The Special Master: You mean filed here before me?

Mr. Harrison: No; it is filed in the case.

Mr. McClintic: No, sir; it is not filed in the case anywhere. When we printed that book, we printed it for the information of people in West Virginia, not for anybody in this case or outside of it. In 1871, under a resolution passed by the legislature, three gentlemen, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Jackson and Mr. Campbell made what they called a report, which report was made to the Governor of West Virginia. It never received any attention, you might say, in West Virginia in any way, shape or form. It was for the benefit and information of the people of West Virginia, and when we printed these books, we printed that with it, because that was a document which we wanted people to see, along with the other documents. It is not filed here, in the Supreme Court, or anywhere else.

The Special Master: This is simply cross examination, and cross examination in relation to it does not make it evidence. I was simply inquiring, because I did not know, whether it was something that had been filed before me. Of course I know nothing personally about the Bennett report. I suppose it is competent for them to cross examine in relation to that as well as any other document.

Mr. Harrison: The question is entirely germane to our 676 investigation.

The Special Master: I say he may answer.

A. I have seen this book, Mr. Harrison, and I have run through all the tables there. I have never given any of them very much attention.

By Mr. Conrad:

Q. In the course of your investigations, either direct or through agents in West Virginia, did you learn anything of a sum of between $500,000 and $600,000 in amount which had been derived by the State of West Virginia from the sale of bank stocks, and which appears or did appear a few years ago in their school fund, invested there by the State of West Virginia?

A. At what time?

Q. It was received at the time the bank stocks were sold by the State of West Virginia, whenever that was.

The Special Master: The question is whether you learned in your investigation anything about that item.

By Mr. Conrad:

Q. Did you ever hear of it at all?

A. I would want time to consult our papers on that before I answer it.

Q. Have you any memory about it?

A. What I mean is this paper that is now being printed and which we introduced in carbon form this morning.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. You mean you have no independent recollection?

A. I have no independent recollection. 677

By Mr. Conrad:

Q. You have no impression on your mind?

A. No, sir; not as to that. I cannot identify it.

Q. You never heard that they had actual sequestered, segregated, a sum approaching $600,000 many years ago, the proceeds of the sale of bank stock, and put it in their school fund for the purpose of preserving it?

A. No, sir; I can say absolutely that I never heard that.

Q. Nor anything like it?

A. No, sir; nothing that made any such impression on me.

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1909. List of Acts and deeds by Mr. McClintic. Affidavit of J. S. Darst.]

Mr. McClintic: Just for the convenience of counsel, if they want to look at these acts in the meantime, I want to give the title of a few acts we expect to rely on: 729

Acts of Virginia, restored government, 1861-2, chapter 35, page 20.

Mr. Harrison: Please state as you go along, if it will not inconvenience you, the subject to which the act relates.

Mr. McClintic: That one, as I recollect, gives all the stock of a certain Turnpike Company to the counties through which it passed, called the Marshall & Ohio road.

Acts of Virginia, restored government, 1861-2, chapter 62, page 37. That is in reference to the Kanawha Board.

Mr. Harrison: These are the acts of the restored government?

Mr. McClintic: The acts of Virginia, the so-called restored government.

Acts, 1862, page 13, chapter 15, that is an additional Kanawha Board.

Acts 1862, chapter 18.

Mr. Anderson: We have that volume. That is the compilation made after the war by the West Virginia government—the acts and constitution of Virginia and West Virginia.

Mr. McClintic: Then acts 1862-3, chapter 68, page 58.

The same acts, chapter 72, page 62.
Acts of West Virginia, 1863, chapter 30, page 31.
Also chapter 120, page 178.
Acts 1865, chapter 71, page 61.
Acts 1866, chapter 117, age 115.
Acts 1866, joint resolution No. 8, page 133.

I also want to tender a deed of trust, dated July 30, 1858, between the Coal River Navigation Company of Virginia and James L. Carr and others, trustees.

The Special Master: What is the date of it? 730

Mr. McClintic: July 30, 1858. It grants all the properties and assets of the Coal River Navigation Company to these trustees to secure certain debts therein set out.

(The paper referred to is filed herewith, marked "Plaintiff's General Exhibit No. 2.")

Mr. McClintic: We also tender a deed dated October 25, 1865, between said trustees and certain other parties, purchasers at the trustees sale of said property.

(The paper referred to is filed herewith, marked "Plaintiff's General Exhibit No. 3").

Mr. McClintic: Also a report made by the trustees, recorded July 30, 1867, explaining the persons to whom the money went that arose from the trust sale.

The Special Master: What is that; a report to the court or a report to the corporation?

Mr. McClintic: It is the report to the court, or to the clerk, under the laws of West Virginia, which required a report by trustees.

The Special Master: Simply making it a matter of public record under the statute?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

I also desire to offer in evidence a certificate of J. S. Darst, present Auditor of the State of West Virginia, which is short, and I will read it:

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA,
AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
CITY OF CHARLESTON, TO-WIT:

I, J. S. Darst, Auditor of the State of West Virginia, do hereby certify that I have carefully examined the records of the Board of the School Fund of West Virginia, and that the 731 State received for the benefit of its School Fund in the National Bank of West Virginia in the City of Wheeling three hundred (300) shares of stock, in the Parkersburg National Bank of Parkersburg, West Virginia four hundred (400) shares of stock, and in the First National Bank of Wellsburg, at Wellsburg, West Virginia, three hundred and fifty-one (351) shares of stock. That the records of West Virginia show that these three Banks were the successors of the Northwestern Bank of Virginia at Wheeling known as the parent bank and of its branches at Wellsburg and Parkersburg, respectively. That each of these shares of stock was of the par value of One Hundred ($100.00) Dollars each,

And I do further certify that the State of West Virginia received from the First National Bank of Fairmont five hundred shares (500) of the par value of One Hundred ($100.00) Dollars each of stock in said last named Bank, which was the successor of the Bank of Fairmont, and that such stocks were received by said State for the benefit of her School Fund in exchange of stock formerly held by the State of Virginia in said Banks, which stocks were taken over by the State of West Virginia by virtue of the Act of the Legislature of Virginia, passed on the 3rd day of February 1863.

And I do further certify that out of the remaining assets of the said Northwestern Bank of Virginia as a dividend on the stock so held by said State of West Virginia therein, there was paid to the said State on the 9th day of July, 1867, $10,510.00, and 732 on the 12th day of August, 1868, by G. Lamb for and on behalf of the Commissioners of said Bank the sum of $10,510.00, and that I do not find that any other or further sum was ever paid to said State of West Virginia by the Commissioners of said Bank out of the assets remaining after the three said National Banks had been formed out of the same.

Given under my hand and official seal this 27th day of April, 1909.

J. S. DARST,
(Seal) Auditor.

The Special Master: With reference to the three exhibits introduced, I suppose they are introduced for the purpose of showing some specific fact?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: I do not suppose there is any contingency by virtue of which this record need be encumbered with the documents in extenso. As to documents of that character, I would like counsel for West Virginia to prepare as succinct and concise an abstract as they can of the document, which will go into the record in the place of the document, and if Virginia puts in documents of a similar character, I would like to have them do the same thing. There is no sense in cumbering the record with a great long deed that is only for the purpose of showing one fact. Of course the admitting of the abstract or the admitting of the deed does 733 not foreclose any proposition involved in the case.

Mr. McClintic: The deeds are introduced for just one purpose.

The Special Master: I prefer in cases like that to have counsel themselves make their own abstract rather than undertake to make it myself. I will not cumber this record with a lot of material of that kind. So that counsel on either side can do that and have it assented to by counsel on the other side as a proper abstract.

Mr. McClintic: Those three deeds were with reference to one navigation company, to show that prior to the 1st of January, 1861, the company in which the State of Virginia held stock, of the par value of $96,000, conveyed all its assets to trustees.

The Special Master: You can make a very short abstract to show all that.

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

Mr. Anderson: It became insolvent and lost all its property. That is what you wish to prove?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

Mr. Harrison: That is a fact established by the deeds, is it not, that the company became insolvent?

Mr. McClintic: Yes.

The Special Master: That can be shown, you see, by a very concise abstract.

Mr. Spooner: They could not foreclose without a mort- 734 gage.

Mr. Anderson: I say a mortgage which was foreclosed and did not satisfy the obligations of the company secured by it.

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1909, Direct Examination of C. E. Scoville.]

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Before I forget it, Mr. Scoville, have you examined the books called the journal and ledger, I presume, of the restored government, which I brought here a few days ago?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you state to the court what amount of money those 744 books show were paid to the treasurer of West Virginia on the 20th of June, 1863, or thereabouts, by the restored State?

A. The books of the restored State to which you refer show that $150,000 was turned over to the new State of West Virginia, in three amounts.

The Special Master: On what date?

A. On July 2, 1863, $92,866.17; on the same date an amount of $47,734.03; on July 9, 1863, $9,399.80; total $150,000.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. What other moneys if any were turned over to the new State by the restored State of Virginia?

A. The ledger of the new State of West Virginia, which we have here, shows that on February 1, 1864, there was deposited in the Northwestern Bank at Wheeling $20,771.46, as received, according to the entry in that ledger referred to, from the Treasurer of the Commonwealth of Virginia. That last amount, $20,771.46, is not shown as a disbursement in the books of the restored State.

Q. Do the books show for what purpose that sum of twenty thousand and odd dollars was paid?

A. It is not shown on the books of the restored State. It is shown only on the ledger of the new State of West Virginia as a receipt.

Q. The Act of February 4, 1863, of Virginia, made an appropriation to West Virginia of $150,000 in the first section, 745 and in the second provided "that there shall be and hereby is appropriated * * * all balances not otherwise appropriated that may remain in the treasury." Did you examine the books to see if there were any balances of moneys appropriated and not expended on the 20th of June, 1863?

A. Yes, sir.

The Special Master: In the State of Virginia?

Mr. McClintic: In the State of Virginia.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. What balances if any were shown?

A. The balance shown on June 19, 1863, as being on hand in the restored State was $225,280.07.

Q. I mean the balances of appropriations made for specific purposes and not yet expended. That is what this act says.

A. I have no information as to that.

Mr. Spooner: That is ascertainable, is it not?

The Witness: I don't think so, from the books.

Mr. Harrison: What was the amount you stated just now?

The Witness: $225,280.07.

The Special Master: That is the balance on hand according to the books. That has no relation to these appropriations inquired of. The inquiry was what balances of appropriations that had been made there were on hand and unexpended, upon which this act of the legislature might be predicated. He says he does not know, and I think he said he thought it would be difficult to ascertain.

Mr. McClintic: The letter from S. P. Hildreth to F. H. 746
Pierpont—

Mr. Anderson: What are you reading from?

Mr. McClintic: From the journal of the Senate of West Virginia, 1862.

The Special Master: That is the letter that has already appeared in the case?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir. It shows a number of balances. They are not added up, and there is a whole lot of accounts. I will ask Mr. Dixey to add them up. I will call the matter up again when I get that added up. While we are on that point, your Honor, I want to put in evidence or in the case all of page 24 of the journal of the House of Delegates of the Commonwealth of Virginia, extra session, which met on the 4th day of December, 1862, being a part of the report of Samuel Crane, Auditor of Public Accounts. I will see that it is typewritten in some form, to put into the report, so it applies to the question of argument which we will come to later, whether this $150,000 should be in any way charged to us.

Mr. Hogg: It is spoken of in the Act of February 4, 1863.

Mr. McClintic: The report is not spoken of, but it is applicable to that matter on the question of that charge. I suppose, your Honor, in every case where we want to refer to a journal, that will have to be put specially in evidence—the public journal of the legislature. Is that in the same position as a public act?

The Special Master: I think you had better put into the 747 record somewhere the extracts on which you rely.

Mr. McClintic: Yes; I suppose it might be well to do that.

The Special Master: I have not examined to see whether they would be taken judicial notice of.

Mr. Spooner: I do not think they would.

Mr. Hogg: They have to be proved.

Mr. Anderson: What is the date of the journal?

Mr. McClintic: It is the journal of the special session in 1862. This report is dated Wheeling, November 25, 1862.

Mr. Anderson: The decree makes the public acts and records of the two States since the admission of West Virginia evidence, if pertinent and duly authenticated.

Mr. Spooner: It makes them competent, but they have to be introduced and put into the record. The court does not take judicial notice of them.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. I find, Mr. Scoville, by an addition of the balances as reported in this letter of Mr. Hildreth, the Treasurer of Virginia, that the amount of these balances, added up, is $19,570.71. How much does that differ from the amount you found was paid to West Virginia by Virginia?

A. Will you give me that again, please?

Q. $19,570.71?

A. As I understand the question, you want to know the difference between that and that last amount of $20,000?

Q. Yes; whatever it was. I do not remember the amount.

A. The amount was $20,771.46. The difference is $1,200.75.

The Special Master: In which exhibit do they charge you 748 with $150,000?

Mr. McClintic: They charge us in their exhibit G-1, under the 7th paragraph of the decree, with $225,000, and also some other sum.

The Special Master: On what page do you find that?

Mr. Anderson: It is on the first page of exhibit G-1.

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1909. Amendment to heading on Defendant's Exhibit G-1.]

The Special Master: Have the defendants anything further 789 to submit?

Mr. McClintic: We think not; we have no other witnesses at present; but if your Honor please, we want to correct that heading on Exhibit No. 7, which seems to be a trifle misleading. I will have to admit that as one of the counsel I submitted it without reading the heading.

The Special Master: Leave is granted to amend that. Of course, as far as that is concerned, there is no statement made by counsel on either side that they will be estopped by, and if inadvertently any statement has been made which ought to be qualified or changed, it is quite open for counsel to make such change and amendment as they desire.

[Vol. 7. July 1, 1909. Amounts agreed to.]

The Special Master: Have you Plaintiff's Substitute G-1? 866

Now, am I to understand that as to the amounts you agree, but not as to classification?

Mr. McClintic: In G-1? 867

The Special Master: Substitute G-1, yes.

Mr. McClintic: The Plaintiff's Exhibit G-1 and the defendant's G-1 are two very different papers.

The Special Master: I understand there is a profound difference—

Mr. McClintic: We agree with the amount of the plaintiff's G-1, as I understand it, but deny that we owe it; and I don't know whether they agree as to the amount of our G-1 or not. What is that, Mr. Potter?

Mr. Anderson: We don't understand your G-1.

Mr. Harrison: The amounts may be correct.

Mr. Anderson: The amounts are probably correct, but we do not understand what relation they have.

The Special Master: Well, before we start on theirs let me get this settled, if we can settle it. Do the defendants agree that the amounts stated in the Plaintiff's Substitute Exhibit G-1 are accurately stated?

Mr. McClintic: Yes sir.

The Special Master: Then, put it in the record that both parties agree that the amounts stated in Plaintiff's Substitute Exhibit G-1 are accurately stated. They do not agree as to the question as to whether they are chargeable to West Virginia.

Mr. Conley: We deny that they are properly chargeable to West Virginia.

The Special Master: I understand that. West Virginia denies that they are so chargeable.

Mr. McClintic: Then I understand that they agree the amount states in our Exhibit G-1 are also accurately stated?

The Special Master: Let me have that and I will get that into the record. Now, this involves agreement on quite a 868 variety of items, on which there was disagreement before; but the items, I understand are now agreed upon, that is the amounts are agreed upon?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, we should say the amounts.

The Special Master: In defendant's Exhibit G-1, do I understand that the complainants agree that the amounts stated in G-1—

Mr. Anderson: It has not been revised or changed?

Mr. McClintic: No, sir.

The Special Master (Continuing) Are accurately stated as to amount?

Mr. Anderson: That is true.

The Special Master: So that the record may show that as to the amounts stated in Defendant's Exhibit G-1 the parties agree as to the amounts. Virginia does not agree as to the classification?

Mr. Anderson: No, sir; she does not.

Mr. Harrison: No; nor as to the pertinency or relevancy of the statement.

The Special Master. No. Of course that eliminates the amounts from controversy.

That covers every paragraph in the decree.

[Vol. 7. July 1, 1909. Revised heading for Defendant's Exhibit G-1.]

Mr. McClintic: If your Honor please, before I overlook it, permission was given for us to change the heading of our Exhibit
G-1, and Mr. Dixey has not written on the heading as we pro- 869 posed to change it yet, but he will do so.

The Special Master: I understand that.

Mr. Dixey: Shall I read the revised heading now?

The Special Master: If you please.

Mr. Harrison: You are changing the certificate now. He has certified to certain facts before. Now do you want him to certify to a different set of facts?

Mr. McClintic: Facts are facts. The heading was the only thing that was wrong. The facts speak for themselves. Everybody knew that the James River and Kanawha Company was not wholly in West Virginia—

The Special Master: I will fix this in just a minute. Let me have the schedule so that I can follow it.

Mr. Dixey: The heading of the schedule— 870

The Special Master: Now, counsel for West Virginia desire to have Mr. Dixey, their accountant, change the heading of Defendant's Exhibit G-1. They wish to strike out the heading that now appears and insert in its place the following. Go ahead, Mr. Dixey, read it.

Mr. Dixey: (Reading):

"Summary of the stocks in banks, turnpike, bridge and navigation companies, whose properties were wholly in the limits of West Virginia, received from Virginia by West Virginia, and also a summary of the stocks in certain turnpike companies, and the James River and Kanawha Company, whose properties were partly in each State; and a certain loan to the town of Bath, not including any property, stocks or credits which were obtained or acquired by the Commonwealth after the date of the organization of the restored government of Virginia, April 17, 1861."

The Special Master: This application is in the nature of a change indirectly in the testimony of Mr. Dixey. I shall allow it, and now subject him to cross examination by counsel on the other side. Of course, I would allow any witness to make a change in his testimony if desired to do so.

Mr. Anderson: The point I have in mind is the manner in which this correction should be made. That Exhibit G-1 has already been made a part of his testimony, and he finds now he was mistaken in the caption of that paper, which was a part of the paper as to which he testified, and to the whole of which his certificate relates, except certain endorsements. Of course he ought to be allowed to correct that, and we cannot make any objection to 871 it now being put into the record that Mr. Dixey desires to correct that caption and the statement implied by the caption, and to make a statement that he is now satisfied agreed with the facts.

The Special Master: What you want is, first the schedule as it was originally put in?

Mr. Anderson: Yes sir.

The Special Master: And then you want the correction to appear?

Mr. Anderson: Yes sir.

The Special Master: I think that is proper. I treat all of these schedules as the testimony of each of these experts. If either expert, before this hearing is finished, has reached the conclusion that he has made a mistake, I shall feel bound to allow him to correct it. If it is a mistake of a character that impeaches the verity or the weight to be given to it, it is open to the other side to comment upon for cross examination, and I will give it all the consideration to which it may be entitled. Now, the present status of this matter is that Mr. Dixey has testified, as appears in defendant's Exhibit G-1, and as to the heading of that Exhibit he desires to make a change in his statement. He desires to make a change and I will allow it.

Mr. McClintic: And no other change. It is not changed in any other manner.

The Special Master: Of course that appears.

Mr. Anderson: What is the revised caption.

Mr. Dixey: The stenographer has it.

Mr. Anderson: I would like to hear that.

(The Stenographer read aloud the revised caption, as here- 872 inbefore recorded.)

Mr. Carlisle: As I understand the situation, that heading which Mr. Dixey now proposed just simply embraces the facts which the paper itself shows?

The Special Master: Well, if they contend otherwise, of course that is open to them. And then in answer to that contention it is open to you to set up the contention you now suggest.

When you say "stocks in banks," do I correctly understand that you mean the particular stock that the State held in the banks?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: The extent to which the State was a stockholder?

Mr. Dixey: Yes, sir. I may say that is the heading of the summary: The headings of the sub-schedules, of which there are several, of course will be changed accordingly.

The Special Master: Well, if they require it, I think you ought to submit to them such change as you think ought to be made; so they will have an opportunity to criticise it if they desire to do so.

Mr. Harrison: That affects his entire testimony.

The Special Master: If they insist on it, of course I think I would have to require him to make the changes he makes so that the other side may see just what they are. What do you say about that?

Mr. Anderson: I think we ought to know just what changes are made. 873

The Special Master: Very well. Mr. Dixey, then I will have to ask you to submit such changes as you propose to make so that the other side may have an opportunity to see them and cross examine upon them.

[Vol. 7. July 1, 1909. Agreement relating to depositions on behalf of West Virginia.]

The Special Master: * * * * * * * We will go to paragraph 7. 877 So far as I can see, and I would be glad to have the suggestion of counsel on either side—down to this stage we are in the condition where we cannot go on with any testimony to-day.

Now, coming to paragraph 7, what do you say as to that, paragraph 7 being—

> "The amount and value of all money, property, stocks and credits, which West Virginia received from the Commonwealth of Virginia, not embraced in any of the preceding items and not including any property, stocks or credits which were obtained or acquired by the Commonwealth after the date of the organization of the restored Government of Virginia together with the nature and description thereof."

Mr. Harrison: The amount is agreed to, as it appears of Vir- 878 ginia's Exhibit.

Mr. Carlisle: The amount that Virginia has paid is agreed, but not the value.

Mr. Harrison: But we agree as to the amount.

Mr. Carlisle: We disagree there on the sum of $170,000; and what items does that include?

Mr. McClintic: All the items paid by Virginia.

Mr. Anderson: $150,000 paid at one time, and $20,000 paid at another time. It is not denied that she received that money, but West Virginia denies that she should be charged with it.

The Special Master: Here is the schedule. As to this, I think they agreed on the amount, did they not?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Are you prepared to-day to be heard on either side of the question of any additional evidence establishing the propriety or the impropriety of these items being allowed under paragraph 7? Of course, in the first instance, I would hear Virginia. If you have anything to submit on that, you can submit it.

Mr. Anderson: We have not any additional evidence. West Virginia admits that the money was paid.

The Special Master: Have you any additional evidence on the propriety of making the charge, or is everything in the case that you rely on?

Mr. Anderson: In the case or in the record. I mean the acts of Assembly of West Virginia?

The Special Master: You, of course, want to have this in mind, so as not to have any mistake. If you rely on Acts of West 879
Virginia as probative, I think they ought to be submitted now, if they are not already in. Whatever you have in the way of public records that you rely upon to sustain your contention that this ought to be made a part of paragraph 7, you ought to submit.

Mr. Anderson: They are already in the record. That is, they are in the bill.

The Special Master: The bill has not been put in the case yet, not before me.

Mr. Anderson: There are copies of those statutes already in this record.

The Special Master: All right. And if you have the acts on which you rely recited in your bill in equity, that is all right. If that is a fact, I do not think you need anything more; and especially after having called attention to it, so that the other side know what you rely on. Do you disagree about that, Brother McClintic?

Mr. McClintic: I beg your pardon.

The Special Master: They say that all the Acts of the Legislature in connection with this paragraph 7 upon which they rely, the acts of the State of West Virginia, are in record.

Mr. McClintic: They are acts of Virginia.

Mr. Anderson: The restored Government of Virginia.

Mr. Carlisle: The two acts of February, 1863, and (gives another date).

Mr. McClintic: If I have not put those in I want to put them in.

The Special Master: If they are in the bill in equity, if they are simply recitals of acts of public legislation in the pleadings 880 in the case, so that they can be referred to, that is sufficient so far as I am concerned.

Mr. Anderson: Those acts have been filed by both sides.

Mr. McClintic: Those printed books are mere memoranda, a good deal of them, but the three acts referred to are already in evidence, I think. If not, I want to put them in evidence.

The Special Master: Did you make a memorandum of what acts you relied on?

Mr. Anderson: No, not yet. I called on the Attorney General of West Virginia for an act he wanted, so we would not have duplicates.

Mr. McClintic: That matter was referred to me, and for some personal reasons, which I can state if desired, I was unable to attend to it.

The Special Master: You need not go into the reasons. Then, so far as the plaintiff's Exhibit Substitute Exhibit G-1 either party has any additional evidence to submit, the understanding being that the Acts of the Legislature upon which each party relies are either now in or will be put in and attention called to them by counsel on either side?

Mr. McClintic: The record already shows a report of the Auditor of Virginia, which I called your Honor's attention to, and which I will put in and again call attention to. It is already in the record.

The Special Master: You simply have not pointed it out? 881

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: The book is in?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: That is already in, then. The question now is whether it is desired on either side to offer any additional evidence on this. I understand that additional testimony is not desired on either side. Subject to the understanding that the Acts of the Legislature are either in or are to be put in, the case is closed so far as that is concerned.

Mr. McClintic: The report of the auditor.

Mr. Carlisle: There is the report of the auditor—

The Special Master: I understood him to say that was in. What do you say about that?

Mr. Harrison: I have not seen that yet.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. McClintic says he will furnish that, an extract from the report of the Auditor.

The Special Master: I understood him to say that the book was in.

Mr. Anderson: The book was produced, but I did not understand that the whole of it was offered in evidence.

The Special Master: Let us find out. Brother Anderson suggests that while the book was here at the last hearing he did not get the impression that it was offered in evidence.

Mr. Carlisle: What book?

The Special Master: The Auditor's book. 882

Mr. McClintic: No, I don't want to put that whole book in. I was just putting in a page or two of it. I have not put the book in. I said that was the book that Mr. Scoville and you wanted—

The Special Master: Is there any objection to this understanding? The whole book is offered and admitted in evidence, but only so much of the book will be printed as counsel on either side desires. Does that cover it?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

Mr. McClintic: That covers it.

The Special Master: Now, is it feasible to continue the hearing any longer to-day?

Mr. McClintic: I want to introduce some depositions which we took during recess.

The Special Master: And they relate to what paragraph?

Mr. McClintic: The value of stock. They relate principally to paragraph 7. They are depositions of a list of witnesses which the stenographer can take down.

Mr. Carlisle: I do not think it is necessary to print them in full.

The Special Master: You can print so much of them as you desire.

Mr. McClintic: Then we desire an agreed statement between the Attorney General of West Virginia and the Attorney General of Virginia.

Mr. McClintic: As to the condition of the roads there—

Mr. Carlisle: That is not very long, and perhaps we had better put it in the record.

The Special Master: We can do this. We will agree to put 883 in such part of it as you want.

(Counsel for West Virginia submitted the following paper, above referred to):

"Commonwealth of Virginia,

vs.

State of West Virginia.

PENDING IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Agreement between Plaintiff and Defendant as to certain matters matters of proof.

It is agreed upon by William A. Anderson, Attorney General of Virginia, of counsel for and on behalf of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and by William G. Conley, Attorney General of West Virginia, for and on behalf of the State of West Virginia, that competent and credible witnesses who can be called on behalf of West Virginia will testify to the following facts:

FIRST—BRIDGE COMPANIES.

(1) That the bridge across the Buchannon River, in the County of Upshur and State of West Virginia, near the Mill of Carper and Post, and owned by the Buchannon Bridge Company, was destroyed in the month of April, 1863.

(2) That the bridge across Cheat River, in the County of Preston and State of West Virginia, at the point where said river was crossed by the Brandenville, Kingwood and Evansville turnpike, and owned by the Cheat River Toll Bridge Company, was destroyed in April, 1863.

(3) That the bridge across the North Branch of the Potomac 884
River at the point where said river was crossed by the Cacapon and North Branch turnpike, in what is now Mineral County, State of West Virginia, and owned by the North Branch Bridge Company, was destroyed in the year 1862.

(4) That the bridge across the South Branch of the Potomac River, in Hampshire County and State of West Virginia, and owned by the South Branch Bridge Company, was destroyed in 1862.

(5) That the bridge across the Potomac River at Shepherdstown, in the County of Jefferson and State of West Virginia, and owned by the Virginia and Maryland Bridge Company, was destroyed in 1861.

(6) That the bridge across the Guyandotte River, at or near its mouth, in the County of Cabell and State of West Virginia, and owned by the Guyandotte Bridge Company, was not destroyed, but that the same did not pay any dividend to the owners thereof after the State of West Virginia was formed.

(7) That the bridge across the Monongahela River at Morgantown, in the County of Monongahela, and owned by the Morgantown Bridge Company, paid no dividend after the State of West Virginia was formed, and that the stock was of no practical value.

(8) That the bridge across the Monongahela River at Fairmont, in the County of Marion and State of West Virginia, and owned by the Fairmont and Palatine Bridge Company, did pay to the State of West Virginia a dividend of six per cent per year for several years after the end of the war, on the par value of the stock of twelve thousand dollars assigned to the State of West Virginia 885 therein.

(9) That the bridge across Elk River at Charleston, in the County of Kanawha and State of West Virginia, and owned by the Elk Bridge Company, was destroyed in 1862.

SECOND—NAVIGATION COMPANIES.

(1) That the Monongahela Navigation Company spent no money on the Monongahela River after the year 1825, and that long before the year 1863 all evidence of such work had disappeared and that the stock in said company was of no practical value on the 20th day of June, 1863.

(2) That the amount of money spent by the Tug Fork Navigation Company on the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River was of such a small amount that no evidence of such work remained on the 20th day of June, 1863, and that the stock in said Company was of no value as of that date.

THREE—TURNPIKE COMPANIES.

That the turnpikes owned by the turnpike companies in the Counties of Monongahela, Preston, and other counties of northern West Virginia, had no work of repair done at all on them during the war period and that many of them were cut to pieces by the army travel thereon, and by rains, snows, and high waters, and that many of them became in places and for considerable distances before and after the 20th day of June, 1863, practically impassable, during wet weather, and for a considerable period of time, and that no dividends were ever received from any of them after the State of West Virginia was formed. 886

But said counsel for Virginia respectfully excepts to the competency and pertinency of said evidence and facts to any issue in the cause.

May 21, 1909.

WILLIAM A. ANDERSON,
Attorney-General of the Commonwealth of Virginia.
WM. G. CONLEY,
Attorney-General of the State of West Virginia.

[Vol. 7. July 2, 1909. Statement to Be Made of Roads Paying Dividends.]

1012

The Special Master: It is understood that you wanted to take the deposition of this other witness?

Mr. McClintic: Yes, sir.

The Special Master: Who is he?

Mr. McClintic: Judge Atkinson.

The Special Master: Is it agreed that the defendants may take the deposition of Judge Atkinson and file it as part of the case?

Mr. McClintic: And possibly Mr. Scoville?

Mr. Harrison: I do not think there is any excuse for Mr. Dixey not being able to answer questions put to him.

The Special Master: What do you want to show by him?

Mr. McClintic: That certain roads paid dividends, and at other times did not pay dividends.

The Special Master: What physical difficulty is there in having Mr. Dixey and Mr. Potter agree on those facts?

Mr. McClintic: I think there is none.

The Special Master: I think there cannot be any. They are 1013 all shown by the books.

Mr. Harrison: We object to the taking of testimony by deposition, from these experts.

The Special Master: This is, to an extent, an incidental matter. It is important, perhaps; but as to this matter I understand that the parties now agree that Mr. Potter and Mr. Dixey may submit a joint statement to become a part of the record, upon this question of—what items?

Mr. McClintic: As to the roads and bridges that paid dividends and those that did not.

The Special Master: There cannot be any difficulty about that. Is that agreed on? Let it be recorded that it is so agreed.

Mr. Harrison: I cannot see the relevancy of that.

Mr. Anderson: We object to it.

The Special Master: That is all right. It is agreed that the experts shall submit, to become a part of the record, a joint statement on the question of the roads and bridges that paid dividends, and the amounts paid; but Virginia objects to its relevancy or competency. That settles that item.

Mr. Anderson: That statement ought to show what became of the dividends.

Mr. McClintic: It is all in the record, as to what became of the dividends. * * *

Mr. Moon: As to the dividends, we ought to put in a re- 1015 port.

The Special Master: In the statement that is to be made by the experts in relation to the dividends received, the experts are to submit at the same time a statement showing what the difference between them is, what the records show as to what application was made. There is no difficulty about that. Is that all?

Mr. McClintic: Suppose it would develop that these experts cannot agree?

The Special Master: Then, if the experts do not agree, we will have another meeting, and I will hear the evidence on both sides. If they do not agree about that, I will pass on it later. I shall pass on it in New York.

[Vol. 7. July 2, 1909. Further as to Change of Heading on Defendant's Exhibit G-1. Joint Statement Relating to Literary Fund.]

1019

Mr. McClintic: Exhibit G-1, it seems, was not properly understood yesterday. We put in a change of the heading on page 2.

The Special Master: Yes, with the understanding that you would change the other sub-headings.

Mr. McClintic: And we struck out the heading on the top of page 3.

The Special Master: You need not spend a minute's time on that. If that is a proper subject of criticism I will hear it in the argument.

Mr. McClintic: Then we changed the word "property" to "stock"; and after the word "received", we put the words "wholly or partly".

1020

The Special Master: Any other changes?

Mr. McClintic: That is all.

The Special Master: Is there anything else for me to decide?

Mr. McClintic: On our Exhibit G-1, we withdrew $2,400,000.

The Special Master: I remember that.

Mr. McClintic: I want to have Mr. Dixcy and Mr. Potter make a statement and let it go in afterwards with their other statements, showing the amount of the Literary Fund on the 19th of March, 1823, the amount the first of March, 1861, and where that $24,000 came from.

The Special Master: I understand that a statement may be submitted jointly by Mr. Potter and Mr. Dixcy covering this. I think that settles that.

Mr. Harrison: We do not agree to anything that involves any delay.

The Special Master: You are safe on that, because your expert has got to sign it.

Mr. Harrison: The only other question is how long will they be allowed to take Judge Atkinson's deposition?

The Special Master: I think that has been agreed upon, that it must be taken within the next two weeks, subject to the same conditions fixed by the Master heretofore.

Mr. McClintic: And possibly there will be one or two other witnesses, if you do not object to it.

The Special Master: There will be no other witnesses unless admitted by Virginia. If you want to have other witnesses, and you agree to it—

1021

Mr. Anderson: And we ought to have an opportunity to cross examine.

Mr. Special Master: Certainly. A deposition will not be considered unless you have such opportunity. If they have developed anything in connection with the deposition of Judge Atkinson that it seems necessary for you to take testimony upon that subject, that, in my judgment, raises a serious question in connection with this case. It would be incumbent that you agree that they might take any deposition in reply; or if it raised a serious question of that kind, I should probably open the case.

Mr. Conley: I suggest you limit them to the same time you limit us.

The Special Master: I do; I limit them to one week. West Virginia may have two weeks' time in which to take the depositions referred to, and any depositions in reply on the part of Virginia must be taken in one week from the time the deposition on the part of West Virginia is taken.

Depositions of witnesses taken by the State of West Virginia 1106 to be filed and read as evidence in her behalf in the cause of the Commonwealth of Virginia against the State of West Virginia, pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, which depositions are taken by the consent of parties, beginning on the 20th day of May, 1909, at the law office of Mollohan, McClintic and Matthews, in the City of Charleston, County of Kanawha and State of West Virginia.

Present on behalf of the defendant, the State of West Virginia, Wesley Mollohan and George W. McClintic, of counsel.

Present on behalf of the Commonwealth of Virginia, William A. Anderson, Attorney General of Virginia.

PETER E. LOVE, 1107

a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

(Examined by Wesley Mollohan, Esq.:)

Q. State your name, age, residence and occupation.

A. Peter E. Love, I will be 76 years old on the 13th of June; I am a farmer; and live at Martha, in Cabell County, State of West Virginia.

Q. How is your residence situated as to the Guyandotte River?

A. When I first moved there my farm was lying right on the bank of the River; now it is 400 yards back.

Q. How long have you lived at that place?

A. 56 years last February.

Q. How far is your residence from the mouth of the Guyandotte River?

A. Well, by water—Well, I guess it is 13 miles, that is, the way the railroad runs.

Q. Do you remember when the locks and dams were built in the Guyandotte River?

A. When I moved to Cabell County from Putnam County, in 1853, the locks were mostly completed. That is my recollection. I think they were completed then in 1853. I think they finished them that year.

Q. How many of them were there?

A. Six, I think.

Q. How were those locks and dams constructed—of what material?

A. Wood and stone; cribs built of round logs, timber, and filled with stone.

1108

The counsel for complainant excepts to this question and answer as not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference and as not pertinent to any issue in the cause.

Q. Are any of those locks and dams in the river now?

A. No, sir.

Q. What became of the locks and dams?

A. In September, 1861, the big rise we had in 1861 partially destroyed some of them, filled them up and washed around some of them. I don't know much about some of them above. But I know they weren't much used. I lived at lock No. 3—just about a half a mile above it.

Q. When did they cease to use them?

A. Never used them after the fall 1861.

Q. What finally became of the remains of the locks and dams?

A. In various ways they went out. The timber rotted; the timbers would naturally rot, you know; they rotted down and washed out.

Q. Of what value for navigation purposes was that system of locks and dams after the big rise of 1861?

A. They were worthless after 1861, because they were an obstruction in the way.

Q. Was there any attempt to repair them after the big rise of the year 1861?

A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Were they cleaned out of the river, and if so, about when?

A. Well, I couldn't tell you. I know there was; but I don't know whether the State made an appropriation for the clean- 1109 ing out of those locks and dams; I know they did make an appropriation to clean out the river, and it occurs to me that they did take out some of those locks and dams. The dam at my place now, after the War closed, was lowered and used for mill purposes, for a mill at that point; but the lock was destroyed and was never used for navigation purposes.

Q. What was the character of the big rise of 1861?

A. You mean as to the amount of water?

Q. The bigness of it, and so forth?

A. Well, I do not remember what the height of that rise was, and I cannot tell you. Mr. Swann can tell you more about that than I can.

The counsel for complainant excepts to all the testimony of this witness on the ground that it is not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference, or pertinent to any issue in the cause.

Further the witness sayeth not.

FREDERICK LEE BAUMGARDNER, 1110
a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

(Examination conducted by Wesley Mollohan, Esq.:)

Q. Where do you reside, what is your age, and what is your occupation?

A. Well, I live a mile and a half west of Barboursville, in the neighborhood commonly called Pearidge, Cabell County, West Virginia; I am even 60 years old, and my occupation is that of farming.

Q. How far is your residence from Guyandotte River?

A. Only a mile and a half towards Barboursville.

Q. How long have you lived in that neighborhood?

A. Well, I went there when I was six years old; now, to make the calculation, I am 60 years old, so that would be 54 years the 7th day of last March.

Q. You were living in that neighborhood when the locks and dams were built in the Guyandotte River, were you?

A. Yes, sir. They were working there. I don't know how long they had been working on them.

Q. Of what were they constructed?

A. Out of timber, round logs, and broken up stone.

Q. What one of the locks was nearest to you?

A. The second lock—Barboursville.

Q. What became of the locks and dams?

A. Well, that one particularly was closest to my attention in this big rise in 1861. The water got around it on the west side, and the main river ran around it.

Q. Was it ever repaired or used after that time?

A. No, sir.

Q. Had you occasion soon after that rise to observe the con- 1111 dition of any of the other locks and dams?

A. Well, no, sir. Except the lower dam Guyan, or a mile, I believe they call it, above Guyan. I passed it, I suppose, two or three weeks after that, and I didn't see it was damaged any. It may have been, but I didn't pay close attention to it.

Q. Did you ever afterwards observe its condition?

A. At any time afterwards?

Q. Yes.

A. Oh, yes; it finally washed and rotted out.

Q. What use, if any, was made of the locks and dams after the beginning of the war?

A. There wasn't any.

Q. Of what value were the said locks and dams for the purposes of navigation after the rise of 1861?

A. Well, not any.

Q. What finally became of the remains of the said locks and dams?

A. The timbers rotted down, rotted out, and the stones dropped away. That made little islands in the river, and timber grew upon them.

Q. After the War commenced what care was taken or what repairs were made to the said locks and dams?

A. There wasn't any, to my knowledge.

Q. Did you say there wasn't any?
A. Yes, sir; I said there wasn't any.

And further the deponent sayeth not.

The counsel for complainants excepts to all the testimony of 1112 this witness on the ground that it is not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference, or pertinent to any issue in the cause.

B. F. SWANN,
a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

(Examination conducted by Wesley Mollohan, Esq.:)
Q. State your age, residence, and occupation.
A. I was 76 years old last October; I live in Barboursville, Cabell County, State of West Virginia; I generally follow blacksmithing, wagon-making, and so forth, farm a little, even.
Q. How is Barboursville situated as to the Guyandotte River?
A. Right on the bank of Guyandotte River.
Q. How long have you lived there? How long have you lived at Barboursville or in that neighborhood?
A. I have lived there since 1866. I moved there in 1866.
Q. Where did you live before that?
A. At what we know as the Dusenberry Dam, at Lock No. 3 of the Guyandotte River.
Q. How long did you live there?
A. I have lived there 11 years before I moved to Barboursville.
Q. Do you remember when they constructed the locks and 1113 dams in Guyandotte River before the War?
A. Yes, sir. They commenced working, I reckon it was 1850. The first work that was begun was at Lock No. 3; then Salt Rock in the fall. Salt Rock was the second lock going down the river from the falls. Lock No. 3, they called it, then No. 4. They built a lock between that and Salt Rock.
Q. How were these locks and dams built?
A. What they call crib work—wood work, large round logs, partly hewn, some of them, and some of them were not. Where the planks had to be put on, they were hewn there. They were trimmed together. Then they filled them with broken up stone; then planked over with heavy plank. Piling was drove above to keep the water from cutting.
Q. What connection, if any, had you with these locks and dams?
A. I kept lock No. 3 for five or six years.
Q. What finally became of those locks and dams?

A. They went to naught.

Q. What, if anything, was done to those locks and dams, or repairs made to them after the beginning of the War?

A. None, virtually none; nothing much to do, no use to take care of them.

Q. What, if ever, were they abandoned for navigation purposes?

A. That is hard to tell. They were abandoned, of course, when there was nothing to do.

Q. Were they used for navigation purposes in the year 1861 1114 or thereafter?

A. They were used for navigation purposes a little in 1861, mighty little. They were in the spring. A good deal of timber came out of Guyandotte, in the spring of 1861. They had to go over the locks.

Q. What effect, if any, had the high waters of 1861 upon the locks and dams?

A. Had pretty bad effect; damaged them a great deal first and last. Some of them it didn't damage; others it did.

Q. Was any effort made to repair such damage?

A. No, sir.

Q. What finally became of the locks and dams?

A. Gradually wore out and went under.

Q. What was the condition of those locks and dams in the summer of 1863?

A. Well, they were just about equal to what they were in the beginning of 1862. I didn't see any difference so far as the condition was concerned. They were just about the same. There was no use for them, and they were not used from 1861 to 1863. There wasn't anything to go up or down the river.

Q. Of what value were they as a system of navigation after the year 1861?

A. Well, I couldn't tell you, so far as that is concerned. If they had been looked after and kept up as they had been before that—it took a whole lot of repair work to keep them up before that for the custom and trade of the locks and dams. It took a heap of repair work to keep them up. The lock I kept on the river paid 1115 more than any other one lock on the river. That was Lock No. 3. During high water big pools of water—back water—very often rose over these dams, and they didn't have to go through the locks. They would go over the dam. Of course, steamboats hardly ever went over the dams when they could get to the locks.

Q. Were they used in the navigation of steamboats after 1861?

A. There wasn't any; there wasn't any steamboats used after 1861. There was during 1861 a little trade by steamboats.

Q. What time in 1861?

A. In the beginning of 1861, until about June, I reckon it was. One of the little steamboats sunk between Smith's Creek and Salt Rock; I think it was in the spring of 1861. There was nothing more to do, anyhow.

Q. What became of the remains of said locks and dams?

A. It would take more people than me to answer that. I don't know what became of them. They disappeared and went to nothing —washed out, washed around, broke. Mr. Love said they rotted, but he is mistaken about that, they weren't rotten. They weren't old enough to rot. But the water cut out a place below to let these loose rock drop, and broke off the plank above. The timber was sound; could not be otherwise. They put in there all oak timber. They weren't old enough to rot.

The counsel for complainant excepts to all the testimony of witness on the ground that it is not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference or pertinent to any issue in the cause. 1116

And further the deponent sayeth not.

WILLIAM A. GRIFFITH,

a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

(Examined in chief by Wesley Mollohan, Esq.:)

Q. State your age, residence, and occupation.

A. My age—I cannot swear to my age; but I think it is 82 years. I think I will be 82 years old the 5th day of next month. I reside in Kanawha County, West Virginia.

Q. On what stream?

A. Dry Fork, at Alcott.

Q. What is your occupation?

A. What is my occupation? I haven't got any now. I have always been a river man, but at this time I am only gardening a little at home. I have got no occupation at all. I am not a farmer. I don't think I have got any.

Q. How close is your present residence to Coal River?

A. Four miles.

Q. Did you ever live on Coal River; if so, at what place?

A. I lived a year or about 18 months at lock No. 3 on Coal River, right on the bank. And I might state here that I had charge of the river, or my family did. I had charge of a steamboat.

Q. When did you move to Coal River? 1117

A. I don't remember that.

Q. About what time?

A. Well, I think it was about 1871 or 72; I couldn't tell that very clearly. I could have given you a heap better statement if I had known what I was coming for.

Q. Do you remember the time the first locks and dams were built in Coal River?

A. I cannot give you a perfect date of that; but I think it was about 1856 or 57, somewhere along there.

Q. Where were you living then?

A. I was a young man then, here in Charleston and on the Kanawha River. I didn't have any certain home at all.

Q. Where were you living in the year 1861?

A. I was living in the year 1861 on Brier Creek.

Q. How far from Coal River?

A. Four miles.

Q. What business were you engaged in at that time?

A. I was flat boat piloting on the river, boating for salt companies.

Q. How were those locks and dams constructed?

A. They were built of wood and stone. They made a frame of wood and then filled it with stone.

Q. Do you remember the big rise of 1861?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What effect, if any, did that rise have upon the locks and dams in Coal River?

A. That rise washed out quite a lot of the locks and dams. 1118
It didn't wash the dams out so much as it washed around the locks and cut in the banks around them.

Q. Where were you living in the year 1862, Captain?

A. I was trying to fight for Jeff Davis.

Q. What time did you go into the Army, Captain?

A. 1862, the first of the year, I think.

Q. What use was made of that old system of locks and dams for navigation purposes, after the beginning of the War?

A. There was none, sir. The locks—some of the locks were entirely dismantled, and there was no lockage through them: that is, so far as I know anything about it. I think I am right.

Q. Of what value was that old system of locks for navigation purposes after 1861?

A. Mr. Mollohan, you are asking me questions, and I will ask you one: From 1861 to when?

Q. Until 1862 or 1863—until you left.

A. From 1861 to 1865 they were of no use to anybody at all. They were dismantled. There was no locking through. You could not get through them. They were a retard actually to navigation.

Q. When were the locks and dams rebuilt in Coal River?

A. Well, I will not be certain, Mr. Mollohan, but I think it was in 1866.

Q. Who rebuilt them? Who rebuilt the locks and dams?

A. Major Cupp was the contractor.

Q. Was it by the same company that built the original locks and dams? 1119

A. That was my understanding, sir. I do not know.

Q. What was the name of the last company?

A. Coal River navigation Company.

Q. What was the name of the old company that built the first locks and dams?

A. The old company—I don't know. The old locks and dams were built, I think, by the Peytona Canal Coal Company. They furnished the money; but they might have had another name for it.

Q. Did you ever hear of the name of the navigation company of Coal River used in connection with the first locks and dams put in the river?

A. I don't know who were the officers of that company; but they had two companies—the Peytona Canal Coal Company, and the navigation company. The Peytona Canal Coal Company put up the money all the time; but there were two names to it.

Q. When did you first become a pilot on the Kanawha River?

A. In 1854.

Q. What was the character of the services you rendered as pilot on the Kanawha River?

A. My services were simply to run boats through the channel to get them to market.

Q. What kind of boats?

A. Flat bottom boats—salt boats. That is what we called them.

Q. What did you ship in those boats?

A. Shipped salt; and latterly before I came they commenced 1120 to ship coal.

Q. When did they commence to ship coal by flat boat?

A. That is another thing I can't tell you by date—perhaps somewhere along about 1856.

Q. How extensive was the shipment of coal?

A. Oh, there wasn't any shipping of coal except by one company—the Fields Creek Company.

Q. Had there been constructed any shoots or channels in the river before you commenced piloting on the Kanawha river?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the character of those shoots?

A. Well, they were very oddly constructed, so far as my knowledge goes. They were crooked and very hard to navigate.

Q. How wide were they?

A. They were supposed to be 24 feet wide. They threw these walls up. Boats 18 feet wide would grind on shores of each wall. They were not wide enough to let boats go though free.

Q. Were they generally used for the purpose of sending boats out of the river, or was it the custom to wait until the river got up to run the boats out on the flood?

A. They were used for shipping salt out in low water; but the boats were held very often for a rise to go over these walls.

Q. What loss or destruction occurred in the navigation of these shoots?

A. Why, a great many times the boats would strike the 1121 walls—men couldn't get them off, and they would sink. They caused a good deal of destruction to the operators, to the salt mines.

Q. What is your opinion, as a pilot, of the way these shoots were constructed for navigation purposes?

A. My opinion is, Mr. Mollohan, those shoots were very badly constructed, and were not in accordance with good sense in making channels. You can take that as you please.

Q. What use was made of them in steamboat navigation?

A. Why the steamboats had in many places to run those channels.

Q. How was it when steamboats were going up the river?

A. Why, they could make the channels a great deal of the way, but there were places they couldn't go through. They had to come around. That is where the great trouble is about that navigation. They made them so crooked. They would rather have a straight channel. I am both a steamboat man and a flatboat man.

Q. What is your opinion as to the effect of the construction of those shoots on the navigation of the Kanawha River as it then existed?

A. Do you mean before the War?

Q. Yes, sir.

A. I believe they were an obstruction to the navigation.

Q. What improvements were made to the navigation of the Kanawha River after the War?

A. I don't know. 1122

Q. Were not many of the shoots changed and widened after the War and before the Government of the United States put in the locks and dams?

A. Mr. Mollohan, I think the shoots haven't been bothered since the contract with Barton was finished. If there was any improvement, I don't know of it. He had a contract to change these shoots. He closed it about the beginning of the War. He and his sons were working here, and his son went off in the Confederate Army, and it hurt the old man very much. The son died in the Confederate Army the same year.

The counsel for complainant excepts to all of the testimony of this witness on the ground that it is not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference or pertinent to any issue in the cause.

HENRY V. SATTES,

a witness of lawful age, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

(Examined by Wesley Mollohan, Esq.:)

Q. State your name, age, residence and occupation.

A. I am past 65; I live at the lower falls of Coal River; I am in the milling business at that point.

Q. Where did you live in the year 1861?

A. I lived at the lower falls. 1123

Q. What was your business then?

A. Milling.

Q. At that point?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you acquainted with the locks and dams built in Coal River before the War?

A. I was acquainted with the bigger portion of them on up to No. 4; I had never been above that.

Q. How were they numbered going up the river?

A. They commenced at the first lock at the mouth of the river and numbered up.

Q. How?

A. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8. The lock on Little Coal River was numbered "A".

Q. How were those locks constructed? I mean of what material?

A. Wooden pens filled with stone—cribs.

Q. How were the dams constructed?

A. Same way.

Q. Where were you at the time of the big rise in 1861?

A. I was at the lower falls of Coal.

Q. What effect had that rise on Lock No. 1?

A. I don't think that rise had any particular effect on Lock No. 1. There was a later rise in the winter of 1861-2, that wrecked the lock, and also wrecked No. 2 lock.

Q. How did it wreck them?

A. Well, it washed the top of the dam off of one, I think, to 1124 the best of my knowledge. It broke the cribs of No. 2 and dismantled the gate, and the whole river ran through the crib work above the locks.

Q. When lock No. 2 was rebuilt after the war, was it located at the same place?

A. The lock was located at the same place. They first built on the opposite of the river. They located the lock at the same place, but moved the dam lower down the river.

Q. What effect did it have on lock 3?

A. Well, I don't think that fall had any particular effect on lock 3. It might have lost some of the rigging off of it. But by the end of the war it was gone—knocked and washed to pieces.

Q. How was it as to the locks above that?

A. I don't know, only from hearsay. They were all wrecked above that. There wasn't any locks of any use. People who came to the mill told me that locks No. 4 were all right.

Q. When they reconstructed Lock No. 1 after the War, what did they do to it?

A. Built a new dam; built a new lock.

Q. When the War broke out, what care or attention was paid to those locks and dams?

A. Well, they were working on the locks and dams repairing them, right just at the time the War broke out; but just at the middle of the summer, high water came up, and there wasn't any more done until the end of the War.

Q. Did anybody take care of them?

A. Not that I heard of. 1125

Q. What use was made of them for navigation purposes after the beginning of the War until they repaired and reconstructed?

A. There wasn't any; only one lock on the river they could make any lockage through, and you couldn't get out or in it, because there wasn't any water above or below. That was No. 3.

Q. What use for navigation purposes were those locks and dams in the year 1863?

A. There wasn't any.

Q. What company rebuilt the locks and dams after the War?

A. I think the navigation company of Coal River.

Q. What came of the locks and dams put in the river after the war?

A. Well, they were used until the Peytona Company quit working. They abandoned them. Irons taken off. They were just let go.

Q. Any use made of them now?

A. No, sir; there are no locks in the river.

Q. How is it as to dams?

A. There isn't any but one, No. 1, built in 1867, and kept up by the Bowman Lumber Company.

Q. For what purpose did they use it?

A. To make a pool to handle logs with. By the way, that dam is a few feet higher than No. 7 in the Kanawha.

Q. In the wreckage of these locks and dams, what change did the floods make, if any, to the locks, that is, did it move any of the locks in the river? 1126

A. No, sir; it never moved any of the locks; that is, the foundations. It would just take the tops off and the cribs off.

The counsel for complainant excepts to all the testimony of this witness on the ground that it is not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference or pertinent to any issue in the cause.

W. F. GREGORY,

a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

Questioned by Wesley Mollohan, Esq.:

Q. State your age, residence and occupation.

A. I am 75 past; my residence is Kanawha County, Lock No. 7, West Virginia; and I am a steamboat Captain and Pilot.

Q. How long have you lived on the Kanawha River?

A. Well, I was a year old when I came out from Richmond here. I was born out there, and my father moved over here.

Q. Have you lived on the Kanawha ever since you came to this section of the country?

A. No, sir.

Q. Where else did you live?

A. At Cincinnati, when I wouldn't be on steamboats. I was a young man, then single.

Q. On what river have you been captain and pilot?

A. On the Kanawha and Ohio Rivers; and on Western rivers 1127 as captain.

Q. Were you ever engaged in navigation of flat boats on the Kanawha River?

A. No, sir, only made a few trips with pilots, as a hand. I made the first trip with this man, Captain Griffith.

Q. Were you acquainted with the shoots constructed in the Kanawha River before the War?

A. Well, acquainted, sir, since 1849.

Q. What was their character—how were they constructed?

A. Badly constructed; very crooked and narrow channels.

Q. How extensively were they used in navigation of the Kanawha River?

A. Very little; few steamboats and salt boats.

Q. What parts of the river were used in the navigation of steamboats—the shoots or other parts of the river?

A. I ran the shoots where I had to do it. When there was plenty of water, I didn't have to run them. I ran straight, the way they ought to have been made.

Q. What is your opinion, as a pilot, as to the value of those improvements to the navigation of the Kanawha River?

A. Those old shoots? Very little, sir. They made crooked, the natural course where the waters ran, and crooked they made the channel, the way God Almighty made it.

Q. What improvements were made in the shoots or channels after the War in the Kanawha River?

A. A good deal; made a good river. 1128

Q. How were the new shoots constructed as to the old ones?

A. They were run straight and wider.

Q. After the construction of the new shoots after the War, what use was made of those old shoots?

A. They were stopped up, filled up. They were no account. Steamboats they build now couldn't get into them. If there wasn't bar water, they would have to lay up. The size boats we have now couldn't get in those old shoots.

Counsel for complainant excepts to all the testimony of this witness on the ground that it is not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference or pertinent to any issue in the cause.

Further deponent sayeth not.

JAMES H. WRIGHT,

a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

Examined by Wesley Mollohan, Esq.:

Q. What is your age, residence and occupation?

A. I was 74 the 1st day of last April; now going on 75; I live at Scary, Putnam County, West Virginia. I have always been a pilot all my life.

Q. On what river? 1129

A. Kanawha, and as far as Louisville on the Ohio River.

Q. When did you first commence the navigation of the Kanawha River?

A. I guess I was about 18 years old when I went on the Kanawha River. I have had license for 50 years, and I was a pilot before I got my license, before the license came out, you know, long before the War.

Q. Before the War there were constructed in the Kanawha River certain shoots. Were you acquainted with those shoots?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was their character, as constructed in the river?

A. Well, we had what we call wing dams on each side of the channel. We would cut a lot of brush and put on these dams and put stone on that to back the water up in shallow places.

Q. Were there some shoots constructed with walls?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the channel width of those shoots constructed with walls?

A. I suppose they were something near forty feet.

Q. What use was made of these shoots in the navigation of the Kanawha River?

A. Well, there was very little use made of them. The river was so low you couldn't do much with the shoots—couldn't do anything at all until there was a rise or something of that kind; couldn't do much of anything when the water got under 1130 three feet.

Q. Were the shoots constructed straight or crooked?

A. Very crooked, sir.

Q. What effect did this crooked construction have upon the use of the shoots in navigation?

A. Well, we had to—when we salt boated we would have to land at the end of these shoots, and take both crews to run through these shoots, then walk back four or five miles to get the other boat. Four men couldn't handle one boat.

Q. Was there much loss or destruction of cargoes in the navigation of these shoots?

A. Well, I don't know of any. Sunk a heap of salt boats, but we did that when the river would rise. They would sink on the piles. They never sunk any of them right in the channel. That is the way they lost their salt.

Q. What do you mean by saying that they sunk them on the piles?

A. They put bouys on the piles. We had bouys set on those piles. That is the way we had to run. When the river would rise they wouldn't show up. The salt they lost was—well, they knowed where the piles were, too; but they couldn't keep off of them in the current.

Q. Who put in those piles?

A. James River and Kanawha Company.

Q. Were they a part of the system of navigation?

A. They had the river—both sides of the river; that is, the turnpike.

Q. What, in your opinion, as a pilot, was this system of 1131 navigation as constructed by the James River Company of benefit to the navigation of the Kanawha River?

A. Well, it wasn't very much. If you will allow me to tell you, I will tell you something. I used to run steamboats here when we would have to put everybody off at the foot of a shoal; and stocked up at New River to get water to drink.

Q. How extensively were those shoots used in the navigation of the Kanawha River?

A. It was very bad.

Q. What improvement was made for navigation purposes in the Kanawha River after the war and before the Government of the United States put in the locks and dams?

A. They straightened the shoots and made them much wider.

Q. Did they not also locate many of them elsewhere in the river?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did they not also widen the shoots?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How extensively were those old shoots user ofter the shoots were so straightened and widened?

A. They weren't used at all, only when there came more water.

Counsel for complainant excepts to all the testimony of this witness on the ground that it is not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference, or pertinent to any issue in the cause.

Without waiving the exception, counsel for complainant 1132 wishes to ask the following:

By Attorney General Anderson:

Q. Were the new sluices or shoots to which you have referred a benefit to navigation during low water?

A. Yes, sir; they were.

Q. And the river could not have been navigated at all in period of low water but for these sluices?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. It could not have been?

A. No, sir; it could not have been.

Further dependent sayeth not.

JAMES M. PAYNE,

a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

Examined by Geo. W. McClintic, Esq.:

Q. State you name, age, residence and occupation.

A. James M. Payne; I am 60 years of age; my residence is Charleston, West Virginia; occupation, lawyer.

Q. Where were you born, Mr. Payne?

A. In Giles County, Virginia.

Q. There has been charged by the Commonwealth of Virginia against West Virginia the sum of $2,400 being 50 per cent. of the amount of money which the Commonwealth of Virginia spent for stock in what is known as the Mountain Lake, Salt Sulphur Springs Turnpike Company, which purported to be a turnpike 1133 from Salt Sulphur Spring, in Monroe County, now West Virginia, by the way of Mountain Lake, in Giles County, now Commonwealth of Virginia, to some point on the Virginia & Tennessee Railroad in the County of Montgomery or Pulaski. Please tell what you know of that turnpike and how much of it is in the State of West Virginia, and how much in the Commonwealth of Virginia.

A. I know of that pike, turnpike, having been born and reared near it. Part of it ran through my father's home farm, near Newport, in said County of Giles. My father also owned a farm east of Newport along the line of this road. The distance from Salt Sulphur to Mountain Lake is about 24 miles. From Mountain Lake to Christiansburg Depot is about 24 miles. The portion of the turnpike lying in Monroe County between Salt Sulphur Depot and Peters Mountain is about 8 miles. The remaining 40 miles is in Giles County and Montgomery County, Virginia.

No questions; no exceptions.

Further deponent sayeth not.

DR. C. I. LEWIS,

a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

Examined by Mr. Mollohan:

Q. State your age, residence and occupation.

A. I will be 73 years old July next. I live at Lewisburg, in Greenbrier County, West Virginia. I practiced medicine for about thirty years, sir. I am doing nothing now.

Q. Where were you raised? 1134

A. I was born at the mouth of Kelly's Creek, in this County. I was raised principally one mile below St. Albans.

Q. Had you spent much time before the war at the falls of the Great Kanawha River?

A. Yes, sir; my father lived there about five years.

Q. Had you any other relatives living there?

A. Yes, sir; my grandfather and grandmother were living there.

Q. Do you know where was located the bridge across Gauley River?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where was it?

A. At the mouth of Gauley. The mouth of Gauley is about one mile above Kanawha Falls.

Q. Upon what road or part of what road or turnpike was that bridge constructed?

A. My understanding was the James River and Kanawha.

Q. How long had you known that bridge before the war?

A. I can't remember back—let me see; commence that in 1840. I went to school there when I was ten years old. Well, I had known it for many years.

Q. Was there any other bridge across Gauley except that one?

A. No, sir; that is the only one I know of.

Q. Was that bridge burned down or destroyed during the War; and, if so, by whom?

A. I belonged to Wise's command. When Wise retreated 1135 out of the valley here, out of this valley, my company stopped at what is now known as the town of Montgomery. We remained there some three or four days. When we went east, and when we arrived at the mouth of Gauley, the bridge was burned.

Q. In what year was that?

A. 1861.

Q. How did you cross Gauley?

A. We forded the river about a quarter of a mile above what is known as the mouth of Scrabble Creek.

Q. What Wise was that?

A. Ex-Governor Wise, General Henry A. Wise.

Q. What was your position in the army at that time?

A. I was Captain of Troop 1, 8th Virginia Cavalry.

The counsel for complainant excepts to all the testimony of this witness on the ground that it is not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference or pertinent to any issue in the cause.

Further dependent sayeth not.

JOHN SLACK,

a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

Examined by Wesley Mollohan, Esq. 1136

Q. State your age, residence and occupation.

A. I will be 75 years old the 1st day of November; residence—I resided in Charleston, West Virginia; I have no particular occupation.

Q. Where did you reside in the year 1861?

A. Here in Charleston.

Q. Were you acquainted with a bridge that had been constructed across Elk River before the War?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where was it located?

A. It was located right where the bridge is now. I forget what the name of the street was then, and I really don't know. But it was on the same spot.

Q. On the line of any turnpike?

A. Yes, sir; on the James River and Kanawha Turnpike.

Q. State what occurred to that bridge, if anything, early in the War.

A. Well, when Governor Wise retreated from here in 1861, his soldiers cut the lower strand, that is my recollection, about half, probably not quite half, in two. The bridge didn't fall, and was repaired by the Federal forces when they came up.

Q. What happened to that bridge after that, and when?

A. The next thing that happened to the bridge—they don't say it was the high rise known as the rise of 1861 that damaged it. My recollection is that it did not do any damage. The drift and water raised it way up, and when the water fell the bridge went 1137 back to the normal position.

Q. What happened to it after that?

A. When Lightburn retreated he cut the strand on the lower side of Elk, on the lower side of the bridge, cut it in two, and let the bridge down. Part of it went down in the water.

Q. When was it rebuilt or reconstructed?

A. Well, I cannot fix the date exactly; but it was not reconstructed until there was some legislation which turned it over to Mr. Joseph Biddle. I don't remember now whether that was by the legislation called the restored Government, or whether it was after the State was made; but I think it was after the State was made. I think it was after the 20th of June, 1863.

Q. From the time Lightburn cut its cables, until it was rebuilt, what was its condition? Was it used for any purpose?

A. None at all. The wires at this end of the bridge held it up; that is, this end of the bridge, but the other end was down. The lower side was in the water.

Q. Do you know anything about the destruction of the bridge at Sissonville?

A. I don't know anything about that.

Q. Do you know what became of the bridge at Sissonville, Kanawha County, West Virginia, over the Pocatalico River?

A. My recollection is that it was down for some time, but when it went down or what made it go down I don't know. 1138

Q. Weren't you sheriff of the county?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you sheriff under the restored government?

A. No, sir; I was elected under the old State Government just as the War was breaking out.

Q. Do you know that it was done before the 20th day of June, 1863?

A. I can't be positive about that.

Q. On what road was that bridge?

A. It was on the road that was called the Kanawha & Jackson Turnpike—The Charleston, Ripley and Ravenswood, built by Henry Chapel.

Q. Were you much through this section of the country before June 20th, 1863?

A. Yes, sir; I was around considerable through this end of the State.

Q. Were you anywhere outside of the County of Kanawha?

A. Yes, sir; I was in Cabell County, Roane County, Jackson County, Mason County.

Q. Were you in Putnam County?

A. Yes, sir; Putnam, and what is now Lincoln, Braxton County, Clay County. I can't remember all of them now.

Q. Were you acquainted with the Kanawha & James River Turnpike, located through Kanawha County and adjoining counties?

A. Yes, sir; I was. 1139

Q. What was the condition of this turnpike in the years 1861 and 62 and up to June 20, 1863?

A. Well, in the winter season they were almost impassable, particularly where the Army had travelled.

Q. How did the Army injure this pikes?

A. Well, the travel over them in the winter time destroyed them, cut them up and made them almost impassable.

Q. What effect did the wagons used by the army have upon these pikes?

A. Cut ditches and holes in the roads; had to fill some of the holes up with stone. The James River and Kanawha Turnpike was one of the streets right through the town here. In the winter time they were almost impassable at times. The army would repair it occasionally by putting rock in the mud holes.

Q. What repairs, if any, were made upon these pikes by any public authority in the years 1861 and 62 and up to June 20, 1863?

A. None, I don't think. There were no good roads through this country during the War.

Q. Did you, during that time, make any trip or trips over the James River and Kanawha Turnpike between Point Pleasant and Charleston?

A. Oh, yes.

Q. What was the condition of that part of the Pike?

A. Oh, I stated before, in the winter time it was very bad. Dry weather, of course, helped the roads.

Q. Were you over any part of the James River & Kanawha Turnpike between there and Kanawha Falls during that time? 1140

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the condition of that part of the turnpike?

A. Well, it was bad.

Q. When you say "bad," what do you mean?

A. I mean it was all cut to pieces, particularly in the winter time, and it was almost impassable to get along, even on horseback.

Q. Was there much hauling over that part of the turnpike in connection with the army?

A. Yes, sir; there was a great deal. That is principally what caused the condition of it.

Q. Were you over any part of the Charleston, Ripley and Ravenswood Turnpike during any part of that time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was its condition?

A. The same as the others; in the winter time very bad.

Q. Do you remember what was known as the high rise in the Kanawha River in 1861?

A. Yes, sir; I remember that very well.

Q. Where were you at the time?

A. Here in Charleston.

Q. What effect did that rise have upon the turnpike or the bridges located thereon?

A. Well, it carried out a great many of the bridges. The bridges in the small streams between here and Lewisburg were nearly all destroyed in September, 1861. The bridges from here to 1141 Point Pleasant, my recollection is that they were nearly all taken out. I know some of them were. As I understand, some of them were rebuilt soon. That was in Mason County, and I don't know how that is.

Q. Do you know how far the Charleston, Ripley & Ravenswood Turnpike had been made before the war?

A. Well, it was a pretty good road from here to Sissonsville before the War.

Q. How far had it been made?

A. Well, it was all made before the War. I don't know anything about it about two miles beyond Sissonsville. I think Chapel quit there. It was finished to Fishers. About two miles above Sissonsville, about twenty miles from here.

Counsel for complainant excepts to all the testimony of this witness on the ground that it is not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference or pertinent to any issue in the case.

Further deponent sayeth not.

WILLIAM H. TOMPKINS,

a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

Examined by Wesley Mollohan, Esq.: 1142

Q. State your age, residence and occupation.

A. I am 72 years of age; I reside in Charleston, Kanawha County, West Virginia; I have no occupation at present.

Q. Where did you reside in 1861?

A. I was born in Kanawha County and I reside in Kanawha County, and have always lived here. In 1861 I resided in Cedar Grove, Kelley's Creek, 20 miles above here.

Q. On what road?

A. On the old James River and Kanawha turnpike.

Q. How long did you reside there during the Civil War?

A. Until October, 1862.

Q. Where did you go then?

A. I went to Virginia and joined the army.

Q. When you left this country, which way did you go?

A. I went to Lewisburg first, and from there to Dublin depot.

Q. When you went South, what turnpike, if any, did you travel over?

A. Over the James River and Kanawha turnpike to Lewisburg.

Q. What was the condition of that turnpike when you travelled over it? I mean on that trip?

A. Well, it was no good, sir. I would call it bad.

Q. In what respect?

A. Well, the roads were a good deal cut up and the bridges were gone, especially the bridge across Gauley. We ferried 1143 there.

Q. What, in your opinion, had cut the road up, as you saw it?

A. So far as the army went, that was the cause of it, especially to Gauley Bridge. That was in bad condition. The supplies were hauled during the first year of the War from Ten mile house, ten miles above here.

Q. How far was it from Charleston to Gauley Bridge?

A. We always called it 39 miles.

Q. What temporary devices were resorted to by the army to make the roads passable?

A. They would throw rocks in the road, put timber in it. Sometimes it was kind of a corduroy road. They would put anything in it that they could get to fill up the ruts. There were hundreds of wagons passing over it.

Q. What did they corduroy it with?

A. Anything they could get, rails or anything else. I don't mean all the way; but in some places. They put rocks in the ruts that were cut where they could get them.

Q. Were there not very large armies in the early part of the War between Gauley Bridge and Lewisburg?

A. Well, I can't say that they were very large armies. There were troops at times between Lewisburg and Gauley and the top of Gauley Mountain. Of course, they made raids from there frequently.

Q. In the early part of the war wasn't a large Confederate army in that section under General Lee, and also a large Federal army under the command of General Roscrans? 1144

A. Yes, sir; stations there on the Sewell. That was in 1861.

Q. From what point did the army of General Rosecrans get its supplies?

A. Well, I suppose they got most of them passing Gauley from the head of navigation on the Kanawha.

Q. How would General Lee be compelled to get his supplies?

A. He would have to haul them over the road from the other end. from Lewisburg.

Q. Over what turnpike would these supplies have to be hauled?

A. James River & Kanawha turnpike.

Q. Had you occasion during that time to travel over any other turnpikes in this end of the State, and, if so, what?

A. No, sir; I didn't. I stayed right close at home.

Q. When you returned from the War, at the end of the War, over what road or roads did you come?

A. I came by the way of Lewisburg; and from Lewisburg I came over the James River and Kanawha Turnpike, in June, 1865.

Q. What was the condition of the pike at that time?

A. Well, it was bad?

Q. Had any repairs apparently been made to the road?

A. I don't think there had, sir.

Q. What do you remember about the fact that the small bridges on the road had been destroyed and remained unreplaced?

A. My recollection is that when I returned a number of them 1145 were not there. We had to come around where the bridges were. There had been temporary roads built around. There wasn't any bridges of any particular size that were formerly there but were gone. The roads were in very bad condition.

Q. What connection, if any, had you with the navigation of the Kanawha River?

A. When?

Q. Previous to the War; previous to the Civil War?

A. I didn't have any particular connection before the War; I was up and down the river frequently, but I had no position on the river.

Q. After the War what had you?

A. Well, after the War I steamboated a long time on the Kanawha River and down the Ohio to Cincinnati. I was a member of the Kanawha River Board for three years or more. As a salt manufacturer I used to ship salt down the river in flat boats.

Q. Do you remember, generally, the old shoots that had been constructed in the Kanawha River before the War?

A. Oh, yes; I remember a great many of them—most of them, I suppose.

Q. What were their character? That is, as a means of navigation?

A. Well, sir, they were—they served very little if any. They were narrow and swift, badly located; navigation was very dangerous, that is, by flat boats—and even for steamboats.

Q. Were they straight or crooked? 1146

A. Well, they weren't always straight; they were narrow. The boats of the present day couldn't run through at all. Such boats as I ran couldn't get in those shoots at all.

Q. In passing up and down the river before the war with steamboats, how extensively were those shoots used?

A. They weren't used at all times. Sometimes in ascending it was impossible to ascend them. You would have to wind a boat clear through. It would have been better, in fact, to stay in the current. Another thing, I didn't think it was possible for steamboats to ascend them by winding.

Q. Didn't steamboats in coming up through the Elk shoot usually pass around to the left of the shoot?

A. Yes, sir; left, in ascending it. They would come close to this shore until they came up to the mouth of the Elk.

Q. Do you remember the shoot through Johnson's shoal?

A. That was pretty bad and crooked before it was repaired and rebuilt.

Q. What was the trouble with it?

A. Well, it was crooked and narrow; it didn't afford sufficient water for easy navigation.

Q. Do you remember the character of the shoot Knobs Shoals?

A. Yes, sir. It went down through that old shoot in the middle of the river. The old shoot was in the middle of the river, and it was narrow. 1147

Q. How was it located for the purpose of navigation?

A. Well, it was badly located, and very difficult to run. Afterwards a new shoot was made through there.

Q. Do you remember the improvement in Catfish Shoals above Charleston?

A. Catfish Shoals was a very bad place; but before the War very little steamboating, very little of anything, in fact, was done there. Very little coal and very little salt shipped before the War. But it was a very bad place.

Q. How was that improvement located for the purposes of navigation?

A. Well, they were bad, they were all bad.

Q. Was that so with the shoot from Tackett?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. There was an improvement lower down called Dovey's Dam. Do you remember that?

A. Yes, sir; that was way down.

Q. How was that constructed for the purposes of navigation?

A. Well, that was a badly constructed and very dangerous place; that is, dangerous for navigation. It was a common thing to sink salt boats at any of these shoots.

Q. How was the shoot constructed at 13?

A. Well, before the improvement that was a bad place.

Q. How was that for the purposes of navigation?

A. Bad.

Q. Was there any loss to navigation on account of that shoot?

A. Oh, yes; there has been.

Q. For the purposes of navigation, generally, of the Kana- 1148 wha River, what is your opinion of the shoots constructed in the river before War?

A. Well, I consider them of little or no value for navigation. We generally ran things out of here on a tide or rise. They could have done just as well without the improvement as with it. They would hold salt boats here until they accumulated, fifty or one hundred, maybe, and run them out on a rise.

Q. On such occasions, what use was made of those shoots?

A. None, during the rise. They went over the bars—what we call bar water.

Q. What was the character of steamboats, generally, that navigated the river before 1861?

A. They were small, generally, in comparison with the boats of the present day.

Q. What improvements were made in the navigation of the Kanawha River after the war and before the Government of the United States put in the lock and dam system?

A. Naturally, the river was almost entirely remodeled. A new shoot was made at Elk, one at Johnson, one at Knob, and at 13; besides other places. Tackett, for instance, there was an improvement and at Red House. That was a bad place.

Q. Before the War?

A. Yes, sir; that was very bad. That shoot was narrow and 1149 long. I almost overlooked the Red House shoot.

Q. In these improvements made after the War, were the locations of the old shoots largely abandoned?

A. Oh, yes. They were relocated in a great many instances, and in one or two instances they were simply widened, they simply widened the shoot or straightened it, as in the case of Elk here. Tackett, Johnson, Knob, Red House and Thirteen, you might say they were almost entirely relocated. Elk was widened and deepened and strengthened.

Counsel for the complainant excepts to all the testimony of this witness on the ground that it is not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference or pertinent to any issue in the cause.

Without waiving that exception, counsel for complainant asks the following questions:

Q. What was the principal line of communication between the Kanawha Valley and the eastern part of Virginia? I mean, for many years prior to the War?

A. Principally by the James River and Kanawha Turnpike.

Q. What was the principal line of communication between Charleston and the Kanawha and Ravenswood on the Ohio, during the same period prior to the War?

A. There were two ways of reaching Ravenswood: By the Charleston, Ripley and Ravenswood Turnpike, or you could go down the Kanawha River and up the Ohio. Ravenswood is right on the Ohio River.

Q. The principal line of communication, if any one went 1150 over-land, was by the Charleston, Ripley and Ravenswood Pike, wasn't it?

A. That was the principal way; yes, sir.

Re-Direct Examination.

By Wesley Mollohan, Esq.:

Q. Do you know how far the Charleston, Ripley and Ravenswood Turnpike had been made before the War?

A. No, sir; I don't. I never knew much about that country. Mr. Slack could tell you more about that than I could.

Further deponent sayeth not.

CHARLES W. DERING.

a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

Examined by George W. McClintic, Esq.:

Q. Give your age, residence and occupation?

A. Forty-four; residence, Charleston, West Virginia; occupation, Chief Clerk in the State Auditor's office.

Q. How long have you occupied the position of Chief Clerk in the State Auditor's office?

A. Since March 4th, last.

Q. State, Mr. Dering, if you have examined the books of the Auditor's office as to the First National Bank of Fairmont; and if so, state what shares of stock, if any, the State of West Virginia received from the first National Bank of Fairmont for the shares of stock held by the State in the Bank of Fairmont?

A. Yes, sir; I have examined the records of the Board of 1151
School Fund, and find that the State got 500 shares, of $100 a share, as I am informed.

Q. State if you have examined the books in the Auditor's office and what shares of stock were received by the State of West Virginia from the Northwestern Bank of Virginia at Wheeling and its branches, and the par value thereof.

A. I have examined the records, the same book, and find that the State received from the National Bank of West Virginia from the Northwestern Bank of Virginia at Wheeling 300 shares, and from the First National Bank of Wellsburg 351 shares, and from the Parkersburg National Bank 400 shares, of $100 a share.

Q. State if the records show that the bank at Parkersburg and the Bank at Wellsburg were originally branches of the Northwestern Bank of Virginia at Wheeling, after the National Banks above spoken of had been formed.

A. The records do not show.

Q. Did the State receive any money or other thing of value besides the stock?

A. Yes, sir. I find in the same record two payments or dividends of 5 per cent., amounting to $10,510 each dividend; same record.

Q. State if you found whether or not the State received anything else, so far as the records show, from these two banks than the stocks and moneys above set out?

A. Nothing that I discovered. They do not show any other 1152 payments or any other stocks.

Counsel for the complainant excepts to all of the testimony of this witness on the ground that it is not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference or pertinent to any issue in the cause.

Without waiving the exception, counsel for the complainant asked the following questions:

Q. Do you know what the State of West Virginia did not receive any other money or property or thing of value on account of shares of stock formerly owned by the Commonwealth of Virginia in the Northwestern Bank of Virginia at Wheeling and its branches and any other banks located within the limits of what is now West Virginia, in addition to the shares of stock and money you have mentioned?

A. No, sir; I do not know that West Virginia did not receive anything besides this stock; but I find nothing in the records, so far as I have been over them, except what I stated.

Q. That is all.

Further the witness saith not.

The taking of these depositions is resumed this 21st day of May, 1909, at the hour of 10:00 o'clock A. M., at the same place.

Present on behalf of the defendant, the State of West Virginia: Wesley Mollohan and George W. McClintic, of counsel. 1153

Present on behalf of the complainant, the Commonwealth of Virginia, William A. Anderson, Attorney General of Virginia.

J. K. THOMPSON,

a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposes and says:

Examined by George W. McClintic, Esq.:

Q. Give your name, age, residence and occupation.

A. J. K. Thompson; 66 years old; occupation, farmer, I reckon—as much that as anything else; Winfield, West Virginia, Route No. 1, Putnam County.

Q. What were you doing when the War began in 1861?

A. I was a cadet of the Virginia Military Institute.

Q. If you joined the army, which one and where?

A. When the War broke out, we were ordered to Richmond. I served there as cadet and drill master for a couple of months drilling the Virginia troops that were mobilized there. Some time during the summer I was transferred to this Western Virginia Department. I came here to Charleston, and on Wise's retreat we fell back to White Sulphur Springs. There I organized the 22d regiment. They put 10 companies into that regiment. I served as adjutant until 10th of October, 1861. I resigned that and accepted the first lieutenancy in Company A, 22d Virginia regiment. I served in that company and regiment for the rest of the War.

Q. What parts or counties of what is now West Virginia were you mostly in during the period from 1861 to 1863, inclusive?

A. 1861 to 1863? Putnam, Kanawha, Fayette, Raleigh, Mercer, Monroe, Greenbrier, and Nicholas Counties, and I made one expedition into Randolph, Upshur, Lewis, Braxton and Pocahontas. I was in Pocahontas County frequently during the War. I had a fight or two in there. 1154

Q. What was the condition of the various roads in those counties during the war, as you saw them, in a general way?

A. The roads, it is my recollection—well, I came across from Richmond over the Virginia Central to the Jackson River depot, and from there to Charleston over the James River and Kanawha Pike, and then I tramped that road several times from White Sulphur Springs back and forth. The roads were in pretty fair condition until the armies passed over them. They cut them up. Then they got into very bad condition and remained in that condition until the end of the war; and they were kept up, that is, what keeping was done to them, by the pioneer corps of the Army in what is now West Virginia. The roads from our base of supplies, Doublin Depot and Jackson River depot, were kept up by the pioneer corps of the Army. They had to keep a force of men on the roads all the time, fixing them up, so that we could get over them with the wagons. Of course, one's recollection is not very vivid after this lapse of time. But we were always in trouble with our wagons and artillery trains moving over these roads.

Q. Tell what you know of the James River and Kanawha turnpikes as to bridges in the West Virginia counties, telling if you know, of any bridges that were burned. 1155

A. Commencing with the Poca bridge—that was burned in 1861, on the James River and Kanawha pike; then, I believe, the bridge over Gauley was burned. I do not remember whether it was burned in 1861 or 1862. I know it was burned, though. The bridge across Greenbrier—the bridge three miles on the other side of Lewisburg—that was burned about the time I got my eye shot out, I think. That was in 1862, I believe. That is my recollection. I swear to anything, hardly as to specific times.

Q. How were the creek bridges on this road, if you recollect, were they left or gone?

A. Well, some of them were left. A great many of them were washed out in the fall of 1861—that big rain that produced the highest the flood we have ever had in the Kanawha River.

Q. How was the year 1861 as to rain?

A. It was very wet, the autumn of 1861, all over the mountains up here. When we retreated from Cotton Hill, over the Kanawha, Fayette and Giles Pike, the roads became impassable for Army wagons. A great many were abandoned on account of the roads, just stick in the mud, cut the teams loose and go on. I saw abandoned wagons, I know, as we went along, abandoned by those who went head of us, of course.

Q. State what you remember of the condition of the roads.

A. Where?

Q. In Randolph, Upshur, Lewis, Braxton and Nicholas, as 1156 you saw them on the expedition of April, 1863.

A. Well, they were in very rough condition. They had been cut up by the two armies in the fall of 1861, up there, and I suppose they had never been repaired afterwards. They very much obstructed us on that light Imboden raid. But we didn't have much to haul then.

Q. When you spoke of joining the army a while ago, you joined what was called the Confederate Army?

A. Yes, sir. I believe we didn't join the Confederate army proper until May, 1862.

Q. What official positions have you held under the State of West Virginia or the United States since the War?

A. Well, I have served a term in the legislature, member of the County Court for twelve years. I believe I was a member of the famous Kanawha Board, that wound up the affairs of the old James River and Kanawha corporation. I was a member of the West Virginia tax commission that drafted these tax laws.

Q. What position under the United States?

A. United States Marshal for eight years and a half, I believe.

Counsel for the complainant excepts to all the testimony of this witness on the ground that it is not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference or pertinent to any issue in the cause.

Without waiving that exception, counsel for the complainant, the Commonwealth of Virginia, asked the following questions: 1157

Q. Was there any extraordinary rain fall in western Virginia in the year 1861?

A. In the fall of the year 1861 there was; yes, sir. It was an extraordinary rain fall. It came on about the time of the autumnal equinox.

Q. Did the wet weather continue for a long time during the fall of 1861 in the mountains of West Virginia?

A. Yes, sir; it continued.

Q. Wasn't it frequent?

A. Yes, sir; it was very wet. I think we went back to Cotton Hill late in November. I don't remember much about it after I got to Raleigh, because I was stricken down with camp fever.

Q. Were not all the turnpikes and roads in the counties of West Virginia referred to by you in your examination in chief dirt roads and turnpikes?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Not macadamized?

A. No, sir.

Q. They would be liable, then, would they not, to become very muddy in long seasons of wet weather whether Army wagons went over them or not?

A. Well, they would become muddy if used by any kind of wagons. They would be cut up. Of course, if they were not used they wouldn't become cut up.

Q. They wouldn't be cut into holes unless they were used? That is, cut into holes and ruts?

A. You couldn't use them without their becoming muddy. 1158 Of course, in rainy weather they would become wet, but muddy only when they were used. The wet weather would only make them so that they would be cut up if they were used much.

Q. The Kanawha Road was used a great deal, was it not, before the War and in time of peace?

A. Well, that I cannot speak of it to my own knowledge. I was only over it once before the war when I was a child. I came out here in 1850. I never travelled it again until war broke out. I travelled by rail when I went east; that is, from Charleston.

Q. That was the principal line of communication between the Kanawha Valley and eastern Virginia for many years before the war, was it not?

A. Well, I do not know that I can answer that question from my own knowledge. You see, when the war broke out I was only eighteen years old. I went to Lexington when I was sixteen. I have very little recollection of events prior to the war. I lived in the country.

Q. Wasn't the James River and Kanawha Road the main thoroughfare along the Kanawha Valley and from the Kanawha Valley to Covington after the close of the war until the construction of the C. & O. Railroad?

A. Yes, sir, it was.

Q. Can you state what its condition was after the war?

A. No, sir; I was never over it after the close of the war, except when I went from here to Gauley to go hunting up in the mountains. I believe I never since travelled over the James River and Kanawha Pike except from here to Gauley. That was in 1878, 1159 in the fall of 1878. I came over that road in 1865 from Lewisburg, and it was in bad condition then.

Q. Didn't stages and other vehicles go over it regularly—wasn't there a regular stage from here to Lewisburg after the close of the War?

A. Indeed, I do not know.

Further deponent saith not.

THOMAS SWINBURN,

a witness of lawful age, being first duly sworn, deposed and says.

Examined by George W. McClintic, Esq.:

Q. State, Mr. Swinburn, your age, residence and occupation.

A. I am 69 years of age; I reside in the City of Charleston; I scarcely have any occupation now.

Q. State if you were a member of any army in the year 1861 or during the war of 1861 to 1865; and, if so, what army and what regiment of what army?

A. I was a member of the 7th West Virginia Cavalry.

Q. When did you join the 7th West Virginia Cavalry, if you remember?

A. In fall of 1861. I may state that it was the 8th infantry when I joined it, and it was afterwards converted into the 7th Cavalry.

Q. What counties in what is now West Virginia did you campaign in or be in from 1861 to 1863, so far as you now remem- 1160 ber?

A. First in Kanawha County, a while in Putnam County; from there we went to New Creek, Hampshire County, on the B. & O.; from there we went to Franklin in Pendleton County; then back to Moorfield, Hardy County, and Wardensville in the same county. We passed through Romney on the way to Wardensville, and from there we went to Lost River Bridge in Hardy County.

Q. Were you in Harrison and Randolph counties?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Upshur, Lewis?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Braxton?

A. I think, perhaps, I was; yes, I was.

Q. State, Mr. Swinburn, the condition of the roads in these various counties as you saw them from the year 1861 to 1863?

A. They were all dirt roads. I never saw a macadamized road in West Virginia.

Q. What was their condition as to goodness of repair?

A. Well, in the summer time they were generally a string of dust and in the winter time a string of mud. Dirt roads necessarily will be.

Q. Had the army travel cut them up much?

A. Yes, sir; in soft weather it necessarily would. In bad weather they would become almost impassable. A great many mule teams were hauling supplies.

Q. Do you remember the year 1861 as to whether it was a wet 1161 year or not?

A. My recollection is that it wasn't a very wet year here. It was dry until the big flood came.

Q. The flood was the biggest one they had here for some time?

A. The highest flood here that ever was known.

Q. That would affect the small tributaries of the Kanawha River, or would it not?

A. It did to some extent. There wasn't a great deal in that day to be affected.

Counsel for complainant excepts to all of the testimony of this witness on the ground that it is not responsive to any inquiry directed by the decree of reference or pertinent to any issue in the cause.

Further the witness saith not.

AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by the parties hereto that the signatures of the witnesses to these depositions are hereby waived. And it is further agreed that counsel for the complainant could except to any of the testimony at the close of the deposition of any witness, and that the exception would be of the same effect as if made to each and every question and answer separately at the propounding and making of the same.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, 1162

County of Kanawha, to-wit:

I, J. E. Campbell, a notary in and for the county of Kanawha and State of West Virginia, do hereby certify that the foregoing depositions of Peter E. Love, Frederick Lee Baumgardner, B. F. Swann, William A. Griffith, W. F. Gregory, James H. Wright, Henry V. Sattes, Dr. C. I. Lewis, John Slack, William H. Thompson, Charles W. Dering, J. K. Thompson, and Thomas Swinburn, were taken at the times and places therein set out; and I further certify that each of said witnesses was duly sworn.

Given under my hand and official seal this the 21st day of May, 1909.

(Seal) J. E. CAMPBELL,

Notary Public in and for the County of Kanawha and State of West Virginia.

PLAINTIFF'S GENERAL EXHIBIT 1.

ABSTRACT OF ACTS

OF THE

GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF VIRGINIA

1820 TO 1860 INCLUSIVE.

RELATING TO THE

VIRGINIA STATE DEBT.

Within is an abstract of the Acts of the General Assembly of Virginia, from 1820 to 1860, inclusive,—being acts authorizing subscriptions and appropriations to works of internal improvement, banks, etc., and such other acts, of a general nature, as bear upon the creation, evolution, and administration of the public debt of the State, up to 1861.

It is believed that this list will afford explanations for numerous transactions connected with the matter of this public debt, and will constitute a convenient reference to many authorities needful in the preparation of a statement of the account between the States of Virginia and West Virginia.

The acts are collated into the following divisions:

1. Incorporated turnpike and road companies to the capital stock of which the State subscribed.
2. Roads constructed wholly or partly on State account.
3. Navigation companies, Canals, etc.
4. Railroads.
5. James River Co. and James River & Kanawha Co.
6. Bridges.
7. Banks.
8. Miscellaneous appropriations.
9. Miscellaneous: of a general nature.

EXPLANATORY.

The figures in the left-hand margin indicate the date of the passage of the act and the page of the Acts on which it is to be found. The figures in the right-hand margin show the amounts authorized to be subscribed or appropriated. "B. P. W." means Board of Public Works, under whose direction practically all the works of internal improvement to which the State contributed were conducted. "Incptd." following the name of a company means that the company was incorporated by that act.

Thus:

3/28/51-100 Jefferson & Frederick Tpke Co. Incptd. $10,000. and B. P. W. for 3/5 6,000

The above notation means that by act of March 28th, 1851, page 100 of the Acts of 1850-51, the Jefferson & Frederick Tpke Co. was incorporated, with a capital of $10,000, and that the Board of Public Works was directed to subscribe on behalf of the State for 3/5 of the capital stock, or $6,000.

The within list, being a tabulation of Acts of Assembly, concerns only authorities, and not actual expenditures or transactions; but with the aid of the excellent maps and charts to be found in the office of the Virginia State Corporation Commission, and the annual reports (published in bound volumes) of the Board of Public Works, also to be found in that office and in the State Library, the routes of the various improvements, and the amounts actually expended on them, may be accurately ascertained.

[Vol. 5. May 6, 1909 Plaintiff's General Exhibit No. 1. Abstract of Acts.]

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The hearing was resumed pursuant to the taking of recess.

Mr. Anderson: We desire now to tender an abstract of the acts of the General Assembly from 1828 to 1860, inclusive, relative to the State debt. I have stated to my friends on the other side that there is nothing in this abstract of a controversial character.

The Special Master: Does it duplicate the material already in where these various indebtednesses are related to and connected with the legislation?

Mr. Anderson: It is a synopsis of all the legislation in reference to the public debt. It recites the legislation upon which the debt is created, and it is really an answer to that part of the decree which directs an ascertainment of information as to the authority under which the debt was contracted.

Mr. Carlisle: This was put in a long while ago. We have no objection to it. It is simply an index.

Mr. Anderson: That is all; or at least it is very little more than that.

The Special Master: Is there any objection to it?

Mr. Carlisle: No.

The Special Master: There is quite a good deal of material here that does not seem to relate to the legislation. I suppose this is a duplication of facts already in?

Mr. Carlisle: Yes.

The Special Master: On the left-hand margin are marks indicating what it is, as I understand it.

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

Mr. Spooner: Of course we cannot take the time now to verify it; but we will let it go in subject to revision.

The Special Master: Then that is understood.

Mr. Spooner: If you want to prove anything from the act of course you will have to take the act; but this will help in finding the act.

The Special Master: This would be plaintiff's exhibit A-2, would it not?

Mr. Spooner: If I did say so, I did not mean to say that it goes in subject to objection; I meant it goes in subject to correction.

Mr. Robinson: You have the A exhibits running to A-13 now, I think?

Mr. McClintic: I would suggest you apply another letter to it, the letter H, if that is right.

The Special Master: No; if this relates to paragraph 1—or does it relate to all the paragraphs?

Mr. Anderson: It relates to all the paragraphs.

The Special Master: We will make it plaintiff's general Exhibit No. 1, then.

(The document was accordingly marked by the stenographer plaintiff's general Exhibit No. 1.)

Amounting to the sum of $5,128.82, and leaving a balance (————) in the hands of James L. Carr one of the Trustees of nine hundred and Seventy six dollars and sixty eight cents ($976.68c), which is still unappropriated. The claims thus extinguished with the receipts and other vouchers are herewith returned, and the Trustees file also a report made by the "Navigation Company of Coal River" compamy a statement of the entire indebtedness of the Coal River Navigation," and showing what each creditor was entitled to in money on the 25th day of October, 1865. This report has been delayed in consequence of the inability of the Trustees to get together the Bonds and notes of the "Coal River Navigation Company" which were held by parties scattered from Kanawha to New York, and some of which is thought are now in Europe and not withstanding the time which has elapsed since since the sale was made; and the persistent efforts which have been used by advertisement and otherwise to procure all the bonds, several thousand of them are still out standing and unsettled.

All of which us respectfully submitted by

JAMES L. CARR for himself

Table C, will exhibit the amount of money received into the Treasury (as near as the Auditor can ascertain) for Capitation Tax, during the fiscal year of 1862. It is also proper to remark that other counties than those mentioned, have paid upon this fund, but owing to the absence of their Delinquent Lists, no proper estimate can be made of the amount.

TABLE C.

Amount of Capitation Tax, less Sheriff's Commission, paid into the Treasury by the following Counties, viz:

Mason County	6.00
Preston County	3.00
Wood County	10.00
	$259.00

Table F, will exhibit the whole amount in the Treasury at the close of the fiscal year, 1862, subject to distribution for Educational purposes.

TABLE F.

Capitation Tax	$13,795.44
Fines imposed by Court	259.00
Dividends on Stock	1,500.00
	$15,554.44

The monies received into the Treasury for Literary purposes, are subject to distribution and apportionment under the 79th Chapter, page 416 of the Code of Virginia. The especial attention of the Legislature is requested to this Chapter and its provisions. It will be seen that by the 3d section of this Chapter, that the Auditor of Public Accounts is directed on the first day of January, in each year, upon the order of the Second Auditor, to set apart and pay into the Treasury, to the credit of the Literary Fund for the purposes of Education, the amount of Capitation Tax received into the Treasury for the preceding year. The Second Auditor is then to apportion it out among the several Counties, Cities and Towns having Corporation Courts, under the provision of the 4th section of the same Chapter. The Second Auditor is to apportion it out by the white population of each County, City and Corporation of the State. Under this rule there would not be much for any County, and much the largest share would go to Counties, Cities and Towns of the Eastern part of the State, that have paid no part of the Fund into the Treasury. I think, therefore, the whole Chapter ought to be repealed.

Table G, will exhibit the amount received from the Banks of this Commonwealth, as a bonus, under provision of Chapter 59, page 348, section 48 of the Code of Virginia, and by that section, is a fund for the payment of the interest on the public debt of the State.

TABLE G.

Bonus from Bank at Fairmont	$ 269.87
Bonus from Merchants' and Mechanics' Bank, Wheeling	4,325.54
Bonus from North Western Bank, Wheeling	2,170.25
	$6,765.66

This section ought to be repealed and this money thrown into the Treasury, for while the law remains, the money arising from bonus now in the Treasury, or hereafter to come into the Treasury, cannot be made available for any other purposes.

Table H, will exhibit the money in the Treasury for Internal Improvement purposes.

TABLE H.

Dividends on 326 shares of Stock in the North Western Bank in the name of the Board of Public Works	$978.00

Table K, will exhibit the amount received from Militia Fines for the fiscal year 1862.

TABLE K.

Militia Fines for 1862	$134.87

At the regular session of the General Assembly of 1861-62, there was appropriated $5,000 to pay expenses of the Militia of the State. Under the appropriation, up to this date, over $3,000 have been paid to Drummers, Fifers, Adjutants, Mustering Officers, &c. The Legislature will see that only $134.87 have been received from Militia Fines altogether.

Under the late order of the Executive calling out the Militia of the State, there have been presented to this office large claims for services rendered under this order, as Drummers, Fifers and other charges, that the Auditor has been compelled to reject, there being no law authorizing the Auditor to pay them; many of these claims amount to over one hundred dollars for one county. At this rate the sum necessary to meet these claims, if they are to be paid, will need not less than $10,000. It is a subject that the Auditor dare not venture an opinion upon, but hopes that the Legislature will give to it their proper attention.

Having furnished the Legislature with a true statement of the Finances of the State at the close of the last fiscal year, I now beg leave to call the attention of the Legislature to the necessity of some more legislation to enable the Auditor to have the Revenues of the State more properly collected. Without some additional legislation upon the subject, the Revenues of many of the Counties of the State will never be collected. The highest rates of commission now allowed to Sheriffs and Collectors of the Revenue, is 5 per cent. This is far too small a consideration for Sheriffs and Collectors, where there is no other business for the Sheriff and Collector to do. In many of the Counties it would not give the Sheriff or Collector over $150 or $200 for a whole year's work. The Legislature will see at once that an officer, competent to discharge the duties of Sheriff or Collector, cannot be obtained for so paltry a sum. Many of the Sheriffs and Collectors at work, are only temporarily engaged in the work, under the promise from the Auditor that some provision would be made by the Legislature to increase their compensation, and unless the Legislature does increase their compensation, it will be impossible for the Auditor to hold them.

I would, therefore, as a matter of justice, recommend that the Legislature pass a provision increasing the compensation of Sheriffs and Collectors of the tax on Lands and Property throughout the State, to 10 per cent., where the sum collected does not exceed Ten Thousand Dollars, and where the revenue exceeds Ten Thousand Dollars, 7 1/2 per cent. To pass anything but a general law, would only involve the Auditor in trouble, for the Counties of the State are so unequal in the amounts collected, that it would be impossible to pass laws that would equalize the compensation.—Some Counties would pay the Sheriff or Collector more than others. But the great object to be kept in view, is the collecting and paying of the Revenues into the Treasury; it is for the Treasury and not for the Collector, that this recommendation is made. No injustice is done by General Laws: injustice would be done by passing laws for each County. The Sheriffs and Collectors of the State have been exceedingly prompt, under all the circumstances, in paying into the Treasury; and by a provision of law, such as I have recommended, the Auditor is convinced that in many of the Counties that are now paying nothing into the Treasury, Sheriffs or Collectors could be procured, but without some such provision no hope can be entertained of our getting the Revenue of those Counties collected. The Auditor therefore hopes that his promises, heretofore made to many of these officers now engaged in the collecting of the Revenues, will not be denied them by the General Assembly. If the experience of the Auditor is worth any thing to the Legislature upon any subject, surely it is upon this, the most important of all his duties. I need not assure the General Assembly (for they all know) that the Auditor has labored most assiduously to collect the public Revenues and place them in the Treasury; and I ask the Legislature to pass the provision referred to and make it retrospective, so as to embrace the Revenue of 1862.

The Auditor would most respectfully call the attention of the General Assembly to a provision of law passed by them at the last regular session, Chapter 59, page 55, of the Acts of the General Assembly, passed February 15th, 1862. The law, (as it is short,) will be copied into this report, it is as follows:

Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That the expenses incurred in prosecutions for Misdemeanor, shall be chargeable to the Commonwealth.

The interpretation placed upon this law by Clerks, is that all the expenses incurred by them, such as issuing Subpoenas, Docketing Indictments, Continuance Cases, and such like, in cases of Misdemeanors, are chargeable, under this law, to the Commonwealth, and payable under this law. Many of the Clerks have demanded payment for services, such as above mentioned, of the Auditor.—Even the witnesses for the Defendants have claimed their attendance fees under this law. Fortunately, for the Auditor, the Legislature did not make any appropriation by which prosecutions for Misdemeanors could be paid. The law must be repealed or changed, so as to designate what expenses are meant. The clear presumption is that it only intended to embrace expenses incurred by the Commonwealth in prosecution, and not all the expenses incurred by the Commonwealth and the Defendants; but without some interpretation of the Legislature, this statute must give trouble to the Auditor. If it is the intention of the General Assembly that the Commonwealth is to be chargeable with all the expenses of witnesses, jailor's fees and other expenses, in drunken riots and peace warrants, the Auditor hopes the Legislature will so frame a law that will make it plain what charges are to be paid and what not to be paid by the Auditor.

The attention of the General Assembly is especially called to the Act of the General Asembly, passed February 10th, 1862, called the "Military Fund Bill." The first section provides that the Governor of the Commonwealth shall receive from the United States, the monies heretofore advanced by the State for military purposes, and place them to the credit of the State Treasury. Nothing has been received into the Treasury of the State from that fund. The second section provides that in addition to the monies so to be collected and placed to the credit of the State, as in the first section provided for, the additional sum of Forty Thousand Dollars was appropriated to aid in the further organization, arming, transporting and supporting the military forces of the State, in the service of the United States, or that might hereafter be mustered into the service of the United States. Under this provision, the Executive has paid $11,507.69 since the regular session of the General Assembly. In the opinion of the Auditor, this law ought to be repealed. Surely there can be no use for the State to be paying bills belonging to the National Government, when she has here, at the seat of Government, an officer whose business it is expressly to provide for the support, arming, equipping and transporting of her own troops. While this law remains, it is only a temptation to persons who cannot obtain payment for their claims of the regular army officers, to hope for relief under this provision. And with all due deference to the Legislature, the Auditor would venture the opinion that $50,000 already paid in aid of this object by the State, and not likely to be returned again, is quite enough for the paying Counties of the State.

The Legislature will see that for Lunatics in Jail and Lunatic Asylum, there was paid during the last fiscal year, $6,930.18. The Lunatic Asylum at Weston, Va., being now nearly completed, ought to be furnished as rapidly as possible, so that the lunatics of the State might be better provided for than many of them now are, by being confined in some cell in the Jails of the State. A large number of the female lunatics of the State have been kindly provided for at the Lunatic Asylum, at Columbus, Ohio. The generous offer of the State of Ohio, to take the female portion of these afflicted of our citizens, and provide for them, is deserving the thanks of the Legislature. Without this provision, many of them must have suffered sorely, if indeed, death had not taken them away. The State can now afford to make ample provision for them, and it is to be hoped that the General Assembly will not omit this important duty to the afflicted lunatics of the State.

As a matter of interest, I herewith present a Table showing the several amounts paid by each of the proposed Counties of the New State, into the Treasury of the State. This Table is taken from the Report of Auditor J. W. Bennet, for 1859-60. This Table shows only the Tax on Land, Property, Capitation and Licenses. To this may be added, at least, One Hundred Thousand Dollars more, for Taxes on Banks, Railroads, Express, Insurance and other companies, which would give a grand total of at least Six Hundred and Twenty Thousand Dollars, paid into the Treasury of the State by the Counties of the proposed New State, in 1860.

By reference to Table B, exhibiting the whole amount disbursed by the Auditor in the fiscal year, 1862, the Legislature will find the following items paid by the Auditor that do not properly belong to the ordinary expenses of the State, and in looking to a time of peace, will not be counted as part of the expenses of State to be provided for.

Table No. 1 will show the items referred to in Table B.

Paid upon the order of the Governor for extraordinary purposes, as follows:

For Military purposes for the Government of the United States	$11,507.69
Civil Contingent Fund	16,884.86
Pay of Patrols of State	5,404.91
Pay of Lunatic and other Asylums of State	3,722.63
	$37,520.09
Appropriation for Lunatic Asylum at Weston	21,684.00
Appropriation for the Convention to frame Constitution of New State	16,399.25
	$75,603.34

Deduct this amount from the sum disbursed in the fiscal year, as shown by Table B, as follows:

Whole amount disbursed in the year 1862	$165,450.17
Deduct as stated in Table No. 1	75,603.34
	$89,846.83

Eighty-nine Thousand Eight Hundred and Forty-six Dollars and Eighty-three cents ($89,846.83) is the actual expenses of the State if reduced to a state of peace; and the amount ought to be still further reduced, when the Legislature remembers that during the past fiscal year there was one Regular and One Extra Session of the General Assembly. The Legislature will see by referring to the Table enumerated, that there was a little more than one-half of the money disbursed in 1862, paid for extraordinary purposes, and shows the actual expenses of the State, for the fiscal year ending September 30th, 1862, at only $89,846.83. It will be remembered that this expenditure was not alone for the counties in the proposed New State, but embraces payments made for Alexandria, Accomac and Northampton counties.

If these figures can be relied upon, and when it is recollected that only twenty-nine of the forty-eight counties of the proposed New State, have as yet, paid anything into the Treasury, is it not clear, that with the New State formed and peace restored, the taxes could be reduced one-half, and then produce more revenue than would be required for an economical administration of the State. And here let me state that there will be outstanding and uncollected, due the State from Sheriffs, Collectors, and other persons, of the Counties of the proposed New State, when the State shall have been formed, a sum of not less than $200,000. This, with the balance in the Treasury, will give a sum almost equal to the whole expense of the erection of the Public Buildings of the New State. In this connection permit me to call the attention of the General Assembly to the necessity, if a New State is formed, to some legislation necessary to vest the power in the Courts of the New State to recover the outstanding balances in the hands of Sheriffs, Collectors, Banks, Saving Banks, Railroad Companies, Express Companies, Insurance Companies, Notary Publics, Clerks of Courts, Bridge Companies, Toll Gathers, Superintendents of State Roads, Canal Companies, Escheators or Escheated Lands, and other property, within the boundary of the proposed New State; as also the right to receive dividends on stocks standing in the name of the Commonwealth, Literary Fund, or Board of Public Works, in Banks and other Corporations, within the New State; as also the power to control these stocks until a settlement can be had with the Old State. Would it not be well for the Legislature to repeal the Acts of May last, making an appropriation of One Hundred Thousand Dollars to the New State, and re-enact it, so as to avoid the last clause requiring the New State, in its settlement with the Old State, to account for the One Hundred Thousand Dollars. The money in the Treasury, out of which this One Hundred Thousand Dollars is appropriated, was collected from the Counties of the New State, and the Old State has nothing to do with it. The settlement with the Old State ought to go back to the beginning of the rebellion, and settlement made from that time, if so, the New State is entitled to, and ought to have, not only the One Hundred Thousand Dollars, but all that shall be in the Treasury at the time of its admission. An Appropriation Bill to that effect ought to be framed. The money belongs to the Counties of the New State, and by any just rule, ought to remain with them. By this rule and with the uncollected balances due the State from Counties within the proposed New State, the New State would have the money ready to put up all of her Public Buildings, or nearly so.

The State has about Four Hundred Thousand Dollars worth of stock in the North Western Bank at Wheeling, standing in the name of the Commonwealth, part in the name of the Board of Public Works, and part in the name of the Literary Fund. The State has Fifty Thousand Dollars of stock or loan, in the name of the Literary Fund, in the Bank of Fairmont, and from Fifty to Seventy Thousand Dollars in the Exchange Bank at Weston, making about Five Hundred Thousand Dollars in all. She is also a stockholder in the improvement of the Kanawha river, how much, the Auditor does not know. The State is the owner of several important turnpike roads in the North-Western part of the State, and is a stockholder in many other turnpike and bridge companies. The power to control and use this stock, before and pending, the settlement with the Old State. Some legislation therefore, upon the subject, will be necessary.

Under the provisions of the Bill now pending before the Congress of the United States for the admission of the New State, the Convention that framed the Constitution for the New State, will have to again assemble, and it is respectfully submitted, whether the Legislature ought not to make a small appropriation to meet the expenses of that body while sitting.

All of which is most respectfully submitted,

SAMUEL CRANE,
Auditor of Public Accounts.

DEFENDANT'S GENERAL EXHIBIT NO. 6, A, B, AND C.

(Being Extract From the First Executive Journal of Governor Boreman, 1863.)

Special Message of Governor Arthur I. Boreman to the Legislature of West Virginia.

A.

Executive Department,
Wheeling, July 28th, 1863.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Delegates:

I have received from His Excellency, F. H. Peirpoint, Governor of Virginia, the enclosed communication and the accompanying report of S. P. Hildreth, Esq., on the subject of the Auditor's office and the state of the finances of the State of West Virginia at the time of the organization of the State of West Virginia, which I submit to you for your consideration and action. The report of Mr. Hildreth contains a statement showing as nearly as he could ascertain, the balance in the treasury on the 19th day of June, 1863, which is to be transferred to this State under the provisions of the Act of the General Assembly, passed February 4th, 1863: and also a statement showing the amount of money paid into the treasury by the counties of the State of Virginia outside the boundaries of this State, and the amount drawn therefrom for those counties, and the balance in their favor. The report also shows that some of the appropriations made by the General Assembly of Virginia have been overdrawn, and, as the money in the treasury after paying the appropriations, is the property of this State, it will be necessary for the Legislature to make an appropriation to meet the amount overdrawn, and thereby legalize what has been done. It will also be seen that many of the appropriations have not been exhausted.

It will also be seen from the communication of Governor Peirpoint, that there is a large number of claims against the State of Virginia, held by persons within the boundaries of this State, for the payment of which no appropriations have been made: and that there are no such claims held by persons in the remaining State of Virginia. As the balance in the treasury is to be transferred to this State, it may become necessary to make provision for the payment of those claims due our own citizens, when they are ascertained. At present, I am unable to state their character or amount, but would suggest that the subject be referred to th proper committee to inquire into and report thereon, and the several sums that it is proper, should be paid out of the treasury in discharge of the claims referred to.

It will also be seen from the communication of Governor Peirpont, that he appreciates fully the difficulties that might occur in the absence of the books, papers, &c., of the Auditor's office, or of copies of the same, and, therefore, he proposes to leave those books, papers, &c., in the hands of the officers of this State for the present, but requests that you pass an Act directing that they be all delivered to the proper authorities of the State of Virginia, if they shall be demanded. He does not know that they will or will not be demanded. I recommend that such an Act be passed, and, in view of the contingency mentioned, and of the very great injury that must result to this State, if we should be left without those books, papers, &c., or copies of them, I recommend that provision be made to have copies of them made, in the event that they shall be called for by the proper authorities of Virginia.

By section 6th of the Act passed February 3d, 1863, page 65, of Acts 1862-1863, these books, papers, &c., were directed to be copied, and the copies to be delivered to the Governor of this State "when his election should be officially declared:" and I am informed that the appropriations of the same session of the General Assembly, included a sum sufficient, and was enlarged for the purpose (although not expressed) of copying the same.

But from some cause, unknown to me, the copies have not been made, and, of course, the money appropriated to pay for the same passes to this State by the Act transferring the balance in the treasury of the State of Virginia. The money intended to be used for this purpose thus remains in the treasury.

As these books, papers, &c., or copies of them, are needed almost daily for the purpose of ascertaining balances due from collecting officers, making settlements, &c., I hope the Legislature will take speedy action on this subject. I may say that had it not been that my attention, as well as the attention of the Legislature, has been given to military matters for a few days past, the necessity for which is known to all, this communication would have been made at an earlier day.

LETTER OF GOVERNOR F. H. PEIRPOINT, SENT TO GOVERNOR ARTHUR I. BOREMAN, AND BY HIM TRANSMITTED TO THE LEGISLATURE OF WEST VIRGINIA WITH HIS SPECIAL MESSAGE OF JULY 28, 1863.

B.

Wheeling, July 22d, 1863.

To his Excellency A. I. Boreman,
Wheeling, West Va.:

Sir,—By act of General Assembly of Virginia, passed February 3d, 1863, page 64, it is provided among other things, that all property and debts due the State lying within and owing from persons resident in the boundaries of the new State, should belong to the State of West Virginia, without further transfer. Provision is made also in the same act, requiring the Auditor of Public Accounts of the State of Virginia to procure fit blank books and transcribe therein true copies of all the records, &c., which may be useful to the State of West Virginia. These copies were to be certified by the executive and "delivered to the Governor of West Virginia, when his election was officially declared, for the use of said State of West Virginia." There was also an act passed on 4th of same month (page 68) appropriating one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the State of West Virginia, and also the residue in the treasury after certain deductions therein named.

The Auditor and Treasurer of the State having resigned on the 19th day of June, 1863, it became my duty to appoint successors. I was informed that the copies of the records required by the General Assembly for use of West Virginia had not been made out by the Auditor of Public Accounts—nor had any statements of moneys received and expenditures made, &c., in accordance with the second section of last Act, been made, to ascertain the proper payment to be made to West Virginia out of the Treasury. I therefore directed the Treasurer and Auditor, by the assistance of Mr. Hagans, the Secretary of the Commonwealth, to examine the books, &c., of the Auditor's office and report to me their condition, with a view to ascertain whether any copies were needed of books and papers, &c. Also to ascertain and make statements in regard to the money in the treasury and sources whence derived, &c.

The Treasurer, S. P. Hildreth, furnished me the enclosed report, which I herewith send you.

I suppose it will involve the State of West Virginia in great difficulty to arrive at its rights, under the Acts of Assembly, above referred to, without the original books and papers for reference.

I find there is a number of claims against the State, held by persons in the bounds of the new State, which cannot be paid without further appropriation, the money appropriated, applicable to that subject, having been all expended. You will see from Mr. Hildreth's report the appropriations which have been overdrawn and the amounts. There is also a large number of accounts not audited, connected with the delinquent list and other papers, and with this is the unascertained school fund belonging to counties. (See report.)

There are but four counties in the State of Virginia from which any revenue has been derived. There are no unsettled claims from that sections that I am aware of. If there are any, I can have them arranged, if it is by further legislation. But as the money which is now in the treasury, derived from the counties in West Virginia, will be handed over to the treasury of the State, and as the officers cannot pay a portion of the claims without further legislation, and as it would subject the parties residing in the west to great inconvenience and delay to await legislation in Virginia, and then bring their claims there for payment, it occurs to me that this business should all be settled here by such legislation as may be necessary. Mr. Hildreth states that some of the delinquent lists are not returned, and others incorrect. It occurs to me that there might be difficulty on the part of the State of Virginia, now that the State is divided, to enforce the returns, &c., that may be necessary to settle the accounts with the different counties in regard to the literary fund derived from capitation tax.

I am anxious for the welfare of the new State of West Virginia. I desire to furnish the greatest facilities for securing her interests, and in view of that, I propose to leave the books, papers, &c., with you for reference and settlement, asking that your Legislature will pass an Act directing that they all be delivered to the proper authorities of the State of Virginia when demanded. They may be demanded and may not. I have no authority to say that they will not.

With sincere desire for the future welfare of your new State of West Virginia,

I am yours, &c.,

(Signed) F. H. PEIRPOINT,

Governor.

STATEMENT MADE TO GOVERNOR FRANCIS H. PEIRPOINT BY MR. SAMUEL P. HILDRETH, CONCERNING THE FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN THE NEW STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA AND THE COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA, JULY 14, 1863.

C.

Wheeling, W. Va., July 14, 1863.

His Excellency F. H. Peirpoint:

Dear Sir,—In accordance with your request, I would respectfully report that, with the assistance of Messrs. L. A. Hagans and Dr. Webb, I have examined the papers, vouchers, and memorandums of accounts kept in the Auditor's office of the Commonwealth since the restoration of the Government.

In a book called "Sheriff's Accounts," we found where the amount of taxes reported annually by Commissioners of the revenue were charged to the Sheriffs of the Commonwealth, we compared the Land and Property Books with the accounts as charged, and found the following errors:

Sheriff of Brooke county is overcharged tax on town lots, in 1861, $21; Sheriff of Putnam county, overcharged tax on town lots, $252.80, in 1861; Sheriff of Jackson county is charged tax on personal property, $754.98; it should be $2,241.07; Sheriff of Upshur county is charged tax on personal property for 1862, $506.27; it should be $2,552.50. This Sheriff, according to the account, had paid his indebtedness to the State, and his account has been closed.

Sheriff of Gilmer county is charged tax on lands, $3,093.16; it should be $3,039.16.

Sheriff of Kanawha county is charged tax on town lots, $9,078.94; it should be $1,456.32, and $3, in same account, an undercharge in tax on personal property. For some of the accounts we could not find any land books or property books to compare with.

We next examined a book called "License Book" in which was charged the taxes on licenses. In this we also found some errors, the largest of which was $20, and we concluded to take no account of them.

Next came a book (without any index) called "Railroads, Banks, Express and Insurance Companies," in which was charged the taxes on dividends; in this we found that on the 14th of March, 1863, the Sheriff of Ohio county collected from three Institutions (here in the city) taxes amounting (less his commissions) to $866.59. The whole amount was credited to each of the institutions, in addition to which they were credited with commissions, 5 per cent.

While on the subject of licenses, we omitted to mention that in some instances the Sheriffs owed largely for 1861, while they were over credited for 1862. The proper plan, we think, would have been to have made the Sheriffs pay all that they owed for one year before crediting them anything for the taxes of a subsequent year.

We have no doubt that a number of the accounts in both the sheriffs and license tax books could be closed if they were credited with their delinquent lists and commissions. It is true that owing to the disturbed state of affairs in the State, a number of delinquent lists have not been sent to the office, and it is also true that those which have been sent are not properly credited. After a great deal of patient examination we failed to understand the subject of delinquent lists. In some instances we found them credited to the account, direct, while in others the accounts were credited with the Auditor's warrant for the amount, which was charged to an appropriation called "Erroneous Assessments and Delinquent Tax," in a book called "Journal," (we could find no such appropriation,) whether or not this is the correct plan we are not unable to say.

In a book called "Journal" to which we have referred, we found the amount in the Treasury on the 1st October, 1862, to have been	$120,159.01

In the appropriations of Salaries of Officers of Civil Government an item appears. Voucher No. 945, S. Crane's salary is charged $466.66, which is an error; it should be $441.95. He has overdrawn $24.61. In pay of Auditor's Clerks, Vouchers No's 948 and 949, it appears that both the Auditor's Clerks have been paid from April 1st to July 1st, 1863, overdrawn in one case, $22,23, and the other, $11.12. The following table will show the amount yet unexpended of the different appropriations:

It would require too much time to endeavor to ascertain the amount set aside by law for educational purposes, (which is the capitation tax,) as it would necessarily involve another examination of delinquent lists, and we doubt very much that it could be ascertained correctly. There has been no capitation tax account kept in the books. In conclusion we would say that if the Legislature of West Virginia would pass an Act by which you could get possession of them whenever you require it, we would deliver the books to the Executive of West Virginia, so that the accounts in them might be properly settled, for they can be of no manner of use to you unless they were demanded by the General Assembly of Virginia hereafter.

Very respectfully,

(Signed) S. P. HILDRETH.

Other Evidence and Proceedings Relating to the Several Paragraphs of the Decree and the Case Generally.

[Vol. 1. Nov. 16, 1908. Plan for marking Exhibits.]

The Special Master: I will mark the first paragraph of the decree A, the second B, and so on. So I will say the first exhibit offered will be "Plaintiff's Exhibit A 1", and the one that is now offered will be "Plaintiff's Exhibit B 1", B representing the second paragraph. 56

[Vol. 1. Nov. 16, 1908. Procedure as to objections.]

The Special Master: Let me see if I get this right. I understood Attorney General Anderson to state that they were willing to agree to adopt a suggestion made by Mr. Spooner with reference to the time when the objections should be finally settled and passed upon, but they would much prefer as we go along for you to 13 make such salient objections as occur to you, without stopping to discuss them, so that they might be in a way advised, but not foreclosing you from raising other objections, and leaving all the objections to be finally passed upon. Do I get your meaning correctly?

Mr. Anderson: That is satisfactory. That is a fair statement of our position.

Mr. Spooner: Then I did not understand the gentleman.

The Special Master: I suppose the idea of the Attorney General is that if there is something that it is quite obvious ought to be objected to, they ought to have your objection at the time, in order to save time and make progress, because they might pursue another course if they knew a certain thing might be objected to which was obviously inadmissible. Do I state it correctly? 14

Mr. Anderson: Yes; that is satisfactory.

The Special Master: Then we will have that understanding, that the case may go on and evidence may be introduced by either party to be subject to all objections, objections to made de bene so far as they may occur to counsel as they go along, but not to be argued or discussed, though perhaps the grounds should be set forth; that the making of an objection of that sort is not to foreclose either party making any objections they may have to make ultimately, the question of objections to be passed upon later by the Master with the understanding that if testimony is excluded coming from either side, such side will be given fair opportunity to submit other evidence bearing upon that same point, as they may be advised is necessary in order to protect their rights. Either party or both parties will have full opportunity to bring into this case any evidence that has any legitimate connection with it or any legal bearing upon the issues, that is, within reasonable limits. Now, does that state the understanding satisfactorily?

TESTIMONY ON BEHALF OF THE COMPLAINANT.

In reference to Exhibit H 1.

Mr. Conrad: We now offer in evidence, if your Honor please, the biennial report of the Auditor of Public Accounts for the years 1860 and 1861 of the Commonwealth of Virginia. It was transmitted by the Auditor of Public Accounts to the Governor in November 1861. It gives the statement by counties, each county in the state, and a summary at the close, showing the number of square miles, the personal and real property, the number of slaves taxed, and so on.

Mr. Mollohan: Whose Auditor was he?

Mr. Conrad: He was a native of West Virginia, and perfectly loyal to Virginia and to the Confederacy until that calamity occurred in 1865. Then he returned to the State of West Virginia which had become a state in the meantime and became just as loyal to West Virginia as he had been to Virginia; and he appeared on behalf of West Virginia and made another report of this very debt, some years later. That is as much of his biography as I think appropriate to the submission of this book and the suggestion of my brother.

Mr Mollohan: At the proper time, we expect to object to the book.

Mr. Conrad: Do you object to the book now? It is an official publication.

Mr. Mollohan: We object now, because he is nobody's Auditor.

The Special Master: The book is admitted, subject to objection, under the agreement we have already entered into; 86 and if the counsel for West Virginia see fit at this time to indicate in a general way the character of their objection, it is perfectly open to them to do so. That will give notice to the other side.

Mr. Mollohan. We rely on a number of documents which we will present at the proper time.

The Special Master. Very well; it is admitted de bene, according to the understanding.

Mr. Anderson. I do not suppose you object to this as being the Auditor's report, but you object to the Auditor's report being competent evidence.

Mr. Mollohan. No; he was no Auditor.

Mr. Anderson. He was the Auditor of the Richmond Government, which our friends claim was only a de facto government of Virginia at that time, but still it was a government. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided it was a government.

Mr. Mollohan. This was before the State of West Virginia was formed.

Mr. McClintic: Samuel Gray was the Auditor of Virginia at that time.

Mr. Anderson. A portion of this is the Auditor's report for 1860, when he was the Auditor of the undivided State of Virginia.

Mr. Mollohan. Not in 1861.

Mr. Anderson. Part of this is for 1860. These items here are for 1860, the ones we rely on chiefly, when he was undoubtedly the Auditor of the undivided State. 87

Mr. McClintic: He was only a private citizen, making a report.

Mr. Anderson: Not in 1860.

Mr. McClintic: He did not make the report until 1861.

The Special Master: I suppose the significance of the information depends upon whether or not you both agree upon the facts as stated. If you disagree, then the question comes as to what is the best evidence of the facts.

Mr. Mollohan: We disagree as to this statement. He has our counties all wrong. If you take the map to-day and measure it, you will see it is wrong. He evidently arrives in that book at his area by taking the acreage of land and supposing that every acre charged represented an acre of territory. Our land is charged sometimes three and four times over.

The Special Master: All those suggestions will be entitled to weight, so far as they have weight in impeaching the validity of any computations that may be made.

Mr. Spooner. I was not trying to impeach the witness.

The Special Master: I understand. I remember now the allegations of the bill, and of course the facts stated are quite diverse.

Mr. Anderson: I do not think there will be any controversy between us as to the area. It is a question that cannot be accurately determined from those records. It can only be approximated. The witness took it from the best sources of record he could find.

The Special Master: This will make a start on it, anyway.

Mr. Spooner: Here is a map of West Virginia, prepared by 89 the Auditor of Virginia before the State was divided. It gives the number of square miles of the old State of Virginia as 61,352 square miles.

Mr. Anderson. West Virginia is only 24,000 square miles instead of 45,000.

The Special Master: That book will be marked, "Plaintiff's Exhibit H-1".

(The book referred to, entitled, "Biennial Report of the Auditor of Public Accounts, 1860 and 1861," is filed herewith, marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit H-1.")

Mr. Robinson: That has evidence in it on all the paragraphs of the decree.

Mr. Anderson: If the Master please, we have no further evidence to offer at present on behalf of Virginia.

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1909. Defendant's Balance Sheet of Receipts 575 and Disbursements.]

Mr. McClintic: If your Honor please, I wish to make a short statement. We desire to file, as soon as we get the copies here—and we expect to have them ready by noon today—a statement of all the cash receipts and disbursements of the State of Virginia from March 19, 1823 to January 1st, 1861, beginning with the balances that stood in the various funds on the books of Virginia March 19, 1823; the total of which shows $85,002,130.72. Then we have the counter part of that. I spoke of receipts and disbursements; I should have said those figures represented the receipts. Then we want to show the disbursements from March 19, 1823 to January 1st, 1861, having of course the same balance, a general detail of all those things. This copy that I have here is a preliminary copy. As I have said, we will have complete and correct copies here, probably 576 by 12 o'clock.

The Special Master: In what way will that affect the schedules already put in?

Mr. McClintic: We want to show by that the character of the examination made by Mr. Dixey and his assistants in this case, that he took up each item from books of original entry, beginning March 19, 1823 and running to January 1st, 1861, and this is the complete balanced account which shows, as they say in accountants' language, control of the figures during that time.

Mr. Anderson: I do not understand that this paper Mr. McClintic has referred to has been introduced in evidence.

Mr. McClintic: Not yet; but we will introduce it as soon as the copies of the same, to which I have referred, arrive. I have simply been making a statement from this copy that I have.

Mr. Anderson: We have not seen it and of course we reserve the right to object to it.

The Special Master: But there is no objection to his making the statement?

Mr. Anderson: Not at all. We simply reserve our rights.

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. Please look at this paper and state what it is (handing witness paper).

A. I am holding a carbon copy of the statement prepared by me and under my direction, showing balances of the various funds March 19, 1823; the total receipts of the Commonwealth of Virginia from that date to January 1st, 1861; the total disbursements from March 19, 1823, to January 1st, 1861; and the cash balances in the various funds at the end of that period; together with the supporting schedules showing the details of those receipts and disbursements. 577

Q. Does that account show an absolute balance between the receipts and disbursements?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you believe it to be absolutely correct?

A. I have verified it, yes.

Mr. McClintic: We will offer it, then, as soon as we get the copies.

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1907. Nature and Effect of agreement between accountants.] 726

Mr. Spooner: Your Honor has suggested that these accountants get together and reconcile differences. I suppose that means mathematical differences?

The Special Master: Certainly.

Mr. Spooner: That does not go to any principle?

The Special Master: Not at all.

Mr. Spooner: And if they cannot agree on mathematics, then it will be referred to you. 727

The Special Master: The suggestion is this. The way these accounts have been stated, there are a good many items, which, in the first place, do not appear to be quite identical. In the second place, there seems to be some controversy as to the amount. Now, the great bulk of those things, I suppose, if the accountants get together, can be reconciled and agreed upon, so far as they are able to agree upon them. That will eliminate them as subjects of controversy in the various schedules. So far as they can not agree upon them, I will hear the controversy as to those particular items, and of course pass upon the question of amount myself.

Mr. Spooner: That is where the items are identical, while they differ in total?

The Special Master: Yes; but so far as the principle involved that underlies either schedule or anything the accountants submit is concerned, there is nothing the accountants will do between themselves that will bind the parties, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. Spooner: Before you decide at all any of those things, either party will be heard.

The Special Master: Absolutely; yes. I will hear you in regard to everything in controversy between the parties, involved in every schedule.

Mr. Spooner: That is what I assumed.

The Special Master: Certainly; the parties are to be heard. The only purpose of the accountants getting together is to eliminate elements of controversy in detail. Of course we could 728 sit here and try out each individual difference, but that would be interminable, and entirely unnecessary if the accountants between themselves can agree.

[Vol. 7. July 2, 1909. Introduction of Official documents into evidence.]

Mr. Moon: At that meeting in New York I understand we 1016 are to be allowed to introduce official documents that have a bearing—

The Special Master: Each party will be allowed to introduce anything that is not already in; but the auditor's books are in the case already, the acts of assembly are in, and all official records are in, as I understand it. All the acts of West Virginia and Virginia that have any relation whatever to any part of this controversy, are a part of this controversy and will be in. Does that cover your ground?

Mr. Moon: I am not sure that they are all in.

Mr. Harrison: I do not know that we have referred to all of the auditor's reports.

The Special Master: I will say this. Now, after looking the case over, after the case is printed, if either counsel discovers that they have left out anything that is important, I will re-open the case and give them an opportunity to put it in. I appreciate, of course, that we have gone very rapidly here to-day, and it may possibly be that counsel have inadvertently overlooked something. I do not say that I will open the case for any thing trivial, and of course counsel would not ask that, but if there is something of importance that you find you ought to be heard on and ought to have evidence on, the case will be opened, and you will be given an opportunity to be heard. That may be a little unusual, but I think that is the proper thing to do in a controversy of this magnitude. So you need not eitner of you feel that you are by any inadvertence prejudicing either side. Is that agreeable to both of you?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, sir.

Mr. Conley: Yes, sir. 1017

Mr. McClintic: It applies to both sides?

The Special Master: Certainly; it applies to both sides.

[Vol. 1. Nov. 16, 1908. Direct Examination of A. G. Potter. His qualifications.]

TESTIMONY ON BEHALF OF THE COMPLAINANT.

Under Paragraph 1 of the decree.

26

ARTHUR G. POTTER,

was called as a witness for the complainant, and being duly sworn by the Special Master, testified as follows:

By Mr. Anderson:

Q. What is your professional occupation, Mr. Potter?

A. Public accountant.

Q. State how many years experience you have had as a public accountant.

A. Eight years.

Q. What has been the character of that experience and how extensive has it been?

A. It has extended over general mercantile accounting mat- 27 ter, manufacturing and financial.

Q. Have you done work of that kind in connection with litigated cases?

A. I never did.

Q. Have you any diploma or certificate or license of an official character from any government?

A. I have a certificate of the Regents of the State of New York, making me a certified public accountant.

Q. What are the requisites for granting that certificate? Is there any examination made of the party?

A. There is an examination in the theory of accounts, practical accounting, commercial law, and auditing—four subjects.

Q. Have you had experience, and if so what, in auditing accounts of corporations, firms or individuals?

A. I was an auditor for five years prior to entering the duties of a public accountant. Since that time my work has been of a general public accounting nature, which includes auditing as well as other lines of accounting work.

Q. Please state to the Master whether you have made any investigation—

The Special Master: Just one moment, Mr. Anderson. I do not know whether the counsel for West Virginia raise any question as to the qualifications of the witness. If they do, it will be open to them now, I suppose, to cross examine Mr. Potter upon that point. I do not know that they will raise any question.

Mr. Spooner: No.

The Special Master: You may proceed, then. 28

By Mr. Anderson:

Q. Have you made up any statements or accounts relative to the matters in controversy between the Commonwealth of Virginia and the State of West Virginia in this cause?

A. I have.

Q. How long a time have you devoted to those investigations, and to that work?

A. Approximately seven months and a half.

Q. Did you have assistants in the conduct of those duties?

A. I did.

Q. Were they trained accountants?

A. Yes, sir.

[Vol. 4. May 5, 1909. Cross Examination of A. G. Potter. Methods and Sources.]

ARTHUR G. POTTER, 213
resumed the stand for Cross Examination.

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. Mr. Potter, you are the accountant who made the accounts for the State of Virginia in this matter?

A. I am.

Q. Will you state about how long you were engaged in that work; —actively engaged?

A. About seven months and a half. I have not the exact length of time, but about seven months and a half. 214

Q. Do you mean you were actually engaged in the work about seven months and a half, or that it was seven months and a half from the time you began until the time you quit?

A. No, sir; seven months and a half actual work.

Q. Not continuously, as I understand, but counting the time that you were actually engaged it makes seven months and a half?

A. Yes, sir; we started on the 1st of February and completed our work at the time of the first hearing, with one or two months intervening that we did not work.

Q. From what sources did you procure the information which you embodied in your report?

A. As to the board of public works, from the board of public works' published reports, and later checked those with the internal improvement books, the original manuscript books.

Q. All of them?

A. All of them.

Q. All of those accounts?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. From what sources did you get the other accounts, excluding now the accounts of the board of public works?

A. The Commonwealth accounts we took from the published reports of the treasurer, and the auditor of public accounts, and verified some of them from the original records.

Q. About what proportion did you verify from the original records?

A. Well, if we had occasion to get further description as to roads, internal improvements companies, &c, we referred to 215 the original books. Otherwise we took the accounts of the treasurer and auditor of public accounts.

Q. What proportion of those accounts, as nearly as you can state, did you ascertain by an examination of the original books?

A. We ascertained the amounts paid in by the counties of West Virginia entirely from the original manuscript books. The items of ordinary expenses of government, we took from the published reports?

Q. Did you go to the books of original entry for all the items which are included in the debits and credits to West Virginia?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What books do you mean?

A. The ledgers and day books of the auditor of public accounts, in which there were accounts with sheriffs, coroners, clerks and so forth.

Q. From what source of information did you get the data which you put in the ordinary expenses of State government?

A. The published reports of the auditor of public accounts.

Q. From what source did you procure the information embodied in your report concerning the amounts expended in West Virginia?

A. The reports of the board of public works and the original manuscript books, as I have explained before.

Q. What proportion did you procure from the published re- 216 ports, and what proportion, as nearly as you can state, from the original books?

A. I believe I have testified that we verified all the figures we took from the published reports by the manuscript books.

Q. What do you mean by manuscript books?

A. The books of original entry.

By the Special Master:

Q. The books on file in the State Department?

A. Yes, sir; as to the auditor's office.

Q. Of the Commonwealth of Virginia?

A. Yes, sir; as to the auditor's office.

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. Did you examine the ledgers and journals, or only one?

A. The ledgers and the journals.

Q. You examined the journals?

A. Yes.

The Special Master: Let him state, Mr. Carlisle, what books were kept at that time.

Mr. Carlisle: Yes; I was going to come to that.

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. Will you state now what books were kept and what books you found among the public archives of the state?

A. There was ledger A and ledger B of the board of public works, and the journals that went with them. I think there were three journals for those two ledgers. There were two or three ledgers of the literary fund, I don't recall which. I think there were three, and the journals that went with those. There 217 were the books of the James River Company, ledger and journal, the books of the Northwestern Turnpike Company, ledger, journal and minute books, the books of the James River Company, ledger, journal, minute book and an old minute book which was not filed in the library, but which I found in the top of the Capitol building here, and the ledger, journal and minute book of the Covington & Ohio Railroad. I believe those are all the books.

Q. What other books of original entry, if there are any, did you examine?

A. Ledgers and day books, I believe, and journals in the office of the auditor of public accounts.

Q. Did you examine all of them?

A. I think we examined all of them; yes, sir.

Q. Did you examine all you could find? What do you mean when you say you think you examined all of them?

A. We examined all the books that were necessary to find the receipts from the various counties during the period under review. I think they embraced all of the books in the office of the auditor of public accounts.

Q. There were no original books there except those which showed the receipts from the original counties. Is that what you mean to say?

A. I don't understand your question.

Q. Do you mean to say you found no books there of original entry, or examined no books of original entry, except those books which showed receipts from various counties?

A. These same books showed disbursements, many of them, 218 but as I testified before, we examined the books of the auditor of public accounts for the purpose of ascertaining the amounts paid by the counties into the public treasury.

Q. What counties?

A. The counties of Virginia and West Virginia.

Q. You see, Mr. Potter, I think you misunderstand the scope of my question. I am asking you not what books you examined with respect to any particular matter, or any particular account. I want to ascertain from you, if I can, all the books of original entry which you examined—about what proportion of them, putting them all together.

A. I believe we examined them all in both the office of the auditor of public accounts and the second auditor's office. In other words, we covered the entire bookkeeping system for the period.

Q. Did you afterwards balance your accounts, balance everything, to see whether you had examined all the entries as to receipts by the state during that time, and all the disbursements of the State during that time, and whether they balanced or not?

A. We did make such a balance.

Q. Have you that balance?

A. I haven't it with me; no, sir.

Q. Did you submit it with your report?

A. No, sir.

By the Special Master:

Q. You have it in your notes?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are the notes here in Richmond? 219
A. Yes, sir.
Q. But not present here in court?
A. No, sir; I haven't them with me. They are in the library.

The Special Master: Do you wish those produced?
Mr. Carlisle: Yes.

By the Special Master:
Q. Will you produce them after the intermission today?
A. I would like to have a copy made of them. I have only one copy of the balance.

By Mr. Carlisle:
Q. Have you any memorandum showing the books of original entry you examined?
A. No, sir.
Q. You did not make any memorandum?
A. No, sir.
Q. Have you any memorandum showing the printed official reports which you examined?
A. Showing the what?
Q. The printed official reports you examined?
A. We examined all of the printed official reports of the board of public works, of the Commonwealth and of the literary fund.
Q. Will you tell us how you know you examined them all?
A. By starting in with the figures with which, for instance, the board of public works started, adding the total receipts for that year, deducting the disbursements, and arriving at a new balance at the end of the first year. Taking that balance, we added the receipts for the second year, deducted the disbursements, and ar- 220 rived at a new balance for the second year. Taking that balance, we went to the third year, and so on during the forty years.
Q. That is not shown in your report?
A. No, sir; that is the balance statement I have referred to.

By the Special Master:
Q. You have that on your notes?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You had better have your notes here in the afternoon, so that if they have occasion to inquire about them, you can produce them without delay.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Could you send for them now, Mr. Potter, without any trouble?
A. No, sir; my assistant does not know where they are.
Mr. Carlisle: We would like to have them.
The Special Master: Get them during the intermission.

Mr. Conrad: He can get them in twenty minutes.

The Special Master: Do not suspend for that purpose now. He can get them during the intermission and have his notes here with him. Counsel on both sides had better keep that in mind, and have their original notes here, so that if any question arises about the notes, that can be produced without any delay.

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. When you examined the published official reports, did you find a detailed itemized statement of receipts and expenditures in those books? 221

A. It was somewhat summarized. It was not a detail statement.

Q. Somewhat summarized? What do you mean by that?

A. Well, the criminal charges for one year were given in one item for the whole year.

By the Special Master:

Q. Do you mean for the whole State?

A. Yes; for the whole State?

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. Now, take that item, for illustration. Did you itemize that item by reference to the books of original entry, to see whether it was correct or incorrect?

A. We did not.

Q. Was that the only item you found on the official reports summarized in that way?

A. There were other items of general expense, such as court charges, the penitentiary charges, and such things as that.

By the Special Master:

Q. They were lumped instead of being summarized, as I understand?

A. There was one total for each year in the published reports.

Q. They aggregated the year instead of giving the details?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. When you found that to be the case in regard to any other official report, did you simply take that total as stated there and include it in your account, or did you analyze that item to see that it did cover? 222

The Special Master: To get at the details from which it was made?

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. Yes; to get back to the original source?

A. No, sir; we did not.

Q. Did you do that in any case?

A. We did that with respect to the board of public works expenses. We analyzed all the board of public works expenses.

Q. How about the literary fund?

A. Not the literary fund.

Q. How about the Commonwealth fund, as it was called?

A. No; we did not analyze the details of those general headings.

Q. There were very large expenditures which you have included in your account under those?

A. There were.

Q. And very large as to all these others you speak of?

A. Yes; they were very large.

[Vol. 5. May 6, 1909. Direct Examination T. B. Dixcy. His Qualifications and Methods.]

THOMAS B. DIXCY, produced as a witness on behalf of the defendant, having been first duly sworn, testified as follows:

466

By Mr. Carlisle:

Q. What is your occupation or profession?

A. I am a professional accountant, a certified public accountant, under the laws of the State of New York.

Q. How long have you been engaged in that business?

A. I have been actively engaged in professional accounting since 1900, as an active professional accountant.

Q. What were you doing before that time; were you an accountant?

A. Not a professional accountant. I have been an accountant all my life; yes; but not a professional accountant; not practicing personally.

Q. State, in a general way, what your experience as an accountant has been?

A. I have been manager for Haskins and Sells, an accounting firm of New York. I left them in order to go in a special capacity with the Delaware & Hudson Company of Albany, to take charge of their accounting department and do special work. I returned to professional accounting after leaving the Delaware & Hudson Company and have practiced it since. I was in a professional capacity with the Delaware & Hudson Company, but not generally. 467

Q. State whether or not you have made any examination of the accounts in the States of West Virginia and Virginia under the decree of the Court.

A. I have, sir, made such an examination.

Q. How long a time were you engaged in that?

A. We have been engaged in it for approximately 15 months. It will be 15 months the middle of May.

Q. In what way did you ascertain the items in the charges and credits?

A. We took the books of original entry in the Commonwealth of Virginia in all cases where such books of original entry were in existence. They were in existence without any commission so far as this account was concerned, but we had reference to other books in reference to the examination and the accounting.

Q. Did you examine any public papers and documents in connection with the accounts?

A. All such papers and documents as had reference to the information that was required under the decree.

Q. State to the Court whether you and your assistants personally examined the items upon the books of original entry which entered into your accounts?

A. Yes; we went directly to the books of original entry.

Q. About how many items do you think you examined?

A. I estimated in round numbers;—and carefully estimated. 468 it was not a guess—about 750,000.

Q. And you took them off the books, did you?

A. Yes; we took them off our books. They are tabulated in what we call our working papers.

Q. And you have what you call your working papers?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many men did you have with you?

A. I had from five to nine.

Q. That many all the time?

A. All the time; varying between those numbers.

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1909. Cross Examination of T. B. Dixey. Methods and Sources.]

Cross Examination.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. I understood you to say that you were the professional 579 accountant, who had charge of the investigation of records here for the State of West Virginia?

A. They were made under my supervision and direction, yes, sir.

Q. And you say you occupied in the performance of that work approximately sixteen months?

A. Fifteen months, I think I said. It will be fifteen months the middle of this May.

Q. You began when?

A. We began the 14th of February. 580

Q. And concluded when?

A. The men are still here. They are working on some of the details now; but we turned in our last schedule completed, I think, on May 3rd.

Q. May 3rd of this year?

A. Of this month, yes, sir.

Q. And you began in February, 1908?

A. A year ago this last February, yes.

Q. How much of that time did you spend here in connection with the work ?

A. You mean personally?

Q. Yes, personally.

A. I cannot answer that with definiteness. I was here during some months a longer period than during other months. I have no idea without referring to my diary, so as to state it in specific terms.

The Special Master: State it approximately.

The Witness: I have always said that I have spent about half of my time here. I think that would be approximate. Latterly I have spent more of my time here. I have been here continuously for the last six weeks or so.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. Did not Mr. Potter, who was in charge of the work for Virginia, propose to you that you unite and collaborate together?

A. I don't recall that. My recollection of that incident is that Mr. Potter suggested that we accept a certain amount as shown in one of the Acts. I think the Sinking Fund Act of 1853, as establishing the debt September 30, 1852, and as I knew 581 the books themselves did not substantiate the amount shown in the Act I refused to accept that. I also said to Mr. Potter that our method of examinations, that is the principle on which ours was conducted was so different from his that it would be impossible to collaborate on the other features.

Q. How did you know that; how did you know on what principle he was conducting his examination?

A. I had a very fair idea of the principle on which he was conducting it. I knew what books he was examining.

Q. He was examining the same books you were, I presume?

A. No; he did not examine all the books that we did.

Q. He must have examined some of them.

A. He did examine some of them.

Q. You were at work in the same capitol?

A. No, sir; he was working here and we were in the State Library Building.

Q. You were examining together the public records of Virginia, were you not?

A. We were examining them at the same time.

Q. And had a common object in view, did you not?

A. I don't know that the object was a common one.

Q. You do not? You say you had a general idea of the principle upon which he was working, and am I to understand that you derived that idea solely from the fact that you knew some of the books he was examining? 582

A. Not at all. Mr. Potter and I saw more or less of each other when we were down here, and in a general way there was no secret about what we were attempting to do; but the differences were such that it was impossible to collaborate and get along together—differences of principle.

Q. Did not Mr. Potter suggest as the reason for his proposal to you that it would insure a uniformity of plan in the statement of the accounts that you both were engaged in examining?

A. I do not recollect any such suggestion. Certainly I could not have acceded to it in any event.

Q. You could not have acceded to it?

A. No, sir.

Q. Then, if he had made a proposal, you must have declined it?

A. If the proposal was made I certainly should have declined it.

Q. Why would you have declined it?

A. Mr. Potter was acting under instruction of counsel for Virginia and I was acting under instruction of counsel for West Virginia.

The Special Master: In what respects did your methods differ?

The Witness: Our methods differed as to the detail in which we went into the accounts and the classification of the items.

By the Special Master:

Q. You say you differed in the details. That does not illuminate me very much. In what particular did you differ as to how you went into the details? 583

A. Am I qualified to testify as to what Mr. Potter did? I can tell you what I did.

Q. If you do not know I will not bother you.

A. I was not familiar, of course, with all the details of Mr. Potter's work. I know we examined books that Mr. Potter did not examine, books of original entry, ledgers and journals.

Mr. Anderson: Can you specify what books?

Mr. Conrad: This is important.

The Witness: I can specify, but I will have to look it up.

The Special Master: Was the principal respect in which your methods differed the fact that Mr. Potter took the aggregates in many instances, and that you examined the details.

The Witness: Very largely that was the difference.

The Special Master: I rather inferred that. So that, in substance, was the difference in method between the two. Excuse me for interrupting.

Mr. Harrison: We are very much obliged to you for bringing that out.

The Witness: I should fancy—well, I don't want to guess.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. You don't want to guess?

A. No.

Q. You did no guessing in your examination? 584

A. I tried not to.

Q. For the purpose of considering for a moment the degree of work expended by yourself in this compilation, I will refer you to page 4 of the defendant's exhibit D-1, 4, 5, and 6, which relates to the expenses of the Government of Virginia, classified there as Ordinary Expenses. You stated in your examination in chief that you did not make the examination which is the foundation of that summary?

A. That is true, sir.

Q. But that you did compare the totals and verify them.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. With what did you compare the totals?

A. I said I verified—I don't think I said I compared the totals. If I did say that it was an inadvertence. I verified them, and my verification is right there.

Q. What do you mean by verifying them?

A. I mean, to put it specifically, as to the amounts charged to the various accounts.

Q. Verified them as to the amounts charged to the various accounts?

A. Yes.

Q. Well, did you examine every item?

A. I certainly did not; I made no attempt to.

Q. You did not compare the totals, then, with the books from which the items were taken?

A. Certainly, absolutely. We used every method of verification—

Q. I ask you if you did it?

A. I personally? 585

Q. Yes.

A. I did not in all cases.

Q. We are talking about the case that I have called to your attention.

A. I did not so far as all the items are concerned. I have already testified, I think, that in regard to details my personal examination was confined to an examination about some questions which arose in the course of examination.

Q. Then you have no personal knowledge of the details that enter into and make up the summary of this statement, Exhibit D-1?

A. I should say that was rather a broad statement.

Q. You can answer it in as broad a way as you choose.

A. I think that I have a rather intimate knowledge of the details that enter into the account; but as to specifying the exact amount of each one of the items that went into the account, or to say that I extracted that myself from the books of original entry or that I examined it after it had been extracted from the books of original entry would be very wide of the mark, because in the tremendous volume of items examined that would be impossible for one man to accomplish.

Q. My whole object is simply to ascertain how much you know about foundation of these summaries.

A. I understand that. 586

Q. I am not questioning the fact that they have been correctly taken off.

A. I understand that. I am trying to give you fully my personal relation to the matter.

Q. If I understand correctly, you did not compare the totals that you speak of having verified with the books yourself?

A. Not in all cases, no, sir.

Q. The books of original entry I am referring to now.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you did not have any part personally in the investigation of the books of original entry that resulted in the summary shown in Exhibit D-1?

A. I would like to add something there, if I may. You speak of comparing totals with the books of original entry .

Q. Yes.

A. I hardly know what you mean by that, because the books of original entry do not contain totals. They contain items. The books of original entry do not contain totals, but are made up of individual items.

Q. That is what I presumed.

A. And it would be impossible for me to compare totals with the books of original entry.

The Special Master: What he wants is just exactly what you mean when you say you verified these items. Now, he wants to know, first exactly what you did in the verification. That is what Mr. Harrison wants to get at, just exactly what processes you went through when you did what you say you did and verified these items. Now, what did you do with reference to that which resulted in verification? 587

The Witness: May I explain how the work was done?

The Special Master: Of course that is exactly what he wants, as I understand it.

Mr. Harrison: That is exactly what I want.

The Special Master: Explain exactly what you did when you say you verified these items. What did you do personally. That is what he wants to get.

The Witness: First, the total amounts were drawn off very similarly to the manner in which the Virginia totals were drawn off, I imagine, from the public records. Then we took the books of original entry, and an accountant and an assistant were assigned to abstract from the books of original entry all the items entered therein under a certain heading. For instance, Court charges, criminal charges, civil prosecutions, and various items of that kind. Each account was assigned to a team of accountants, or to an accountant and an assistant, and they went through the books of original entry and abstracted all the items in the period under examination from that account. Another set of accountants, another team, took some other accounts; and in that way all the items of receipts and disbursements were abstracted from the books of original entry and segregated. Then the total of those items, the individual items of each account, made the total account as appears on these schedules.

By the Special Master:

Q. Where did you come in; what did you do in the verification? 588

A. My work was supervisory, and in case any question arose or any question came up I examined that particular account personally, as I did in a number of cases, and passed on the matter where I could pass on it. When I could not pass on it it was submitted to counsel.

Q. Is that what you mean by verification?

A. No, sir; that is not what I mean by verification. Then the accounts were brought together in this final schedule, which we expect to introduce, showing the total of all these accounts, and the balances at the beginning and at the end of the period, and that account being in balance is an absolute verification of all the work that was done, and that I verified.

Q. Then I understand that you verified these various aggregates in connection with this general statement?

A. As a whole.

Q. For the purpose of ascertaining whether the thing balanced in the end?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. Harrison:

Q. The classification of the work and the detail work was done by the gentlemen who were employed under you?

A. Under the constant direction of Mr. Scoville, who was my chief of staff, and who was here all the time.

[Vol. 6. May 7, 1909. Direct Examination of C. E. Scoville. His qualifications and methods.]

CLIFFORD E. SCOVILLE, was produced as a witness on behalf of the defendant, and being first duly sworn, testified as follows:

696

By Mr. McClintic:

Q. State your occupation?

A. I am a public accountant.

Q. State how long you have been engaged in the business of public accounting?

A. I have been engaged as a public accountant continuously for the last nine years.

Q. State where you are registered, if you are registered, if that is the proper term?

A. I have not taken the State examination in any State.

Q. State when you came to Virginia to engage in this 697 present work?

A. On the 14th of February of last year.

Q. How much time have you given it since the 14th of February, 1908.

A. Continuously.

Q. You have been here continuously from that time to this time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Giving your full time and attention to this particular work?

A. Entirely ,sir.

Q. What position did you occupy in relation to the work?

A. Chief of Mr. Dixcy's Staff of accountants, engaged on this examination.

Q. There has been filed here a number of accounts as exhibits. Please state generally what you had to do with all those exhibits and the making thereof, if anything?

A. A considerable portion of the work I did personally, and all of the work in preparing the details, working up to the schedules, was prepared under my direct supervision. I was present while all the work was done, and closely in touch with it all the time.

vs.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

BRIEF OF COUNSEL FOR VIRGINIA UPON THE QUESTIONS RAISED BY THE DEMURRERS.

Statement of Facts as Shown by the Bill.

I.

On the 20th of June, 1863, West Virginia became a State of the American Union pursuant to an act of the United States Congress approved December 31, 1862, and in accordance with a proclamation of President Lincoln made April 20, 1863, under that act of Congress, upon the terms and conditions prescribed by the Commonwealth of Virginia in an ordinance adopted in convention and in the acts passed by the General Assembly of the restored government of the Commonwealth giving her consent to the formation of the new State out of her territory, with the constitution adopted for the new State by the people thereof, and which was sanctioned by Congress.

II.

Prior to the formation of the new State, the Commonwealth of Virginia had contracted an indebtedness approximating, as of the first day of January, 1861, the sum of $33,000,000, evidenced by the contracts and obligations of the undivided State.

This large indebtedness had been created in constructing a system of public highways, turnpikes, canals, railways, and other public internal improvements, begun in the first quarter of the nineteenth century and designed to fairly develop every part of her territory, and to afford means of communication between the different sections of the Commonwealth and the seashore, and to give to the people in all the various portions of the State access to the best available markets.

The "vast potentialities of wealth and revenue in the undeveloped stores of minerals and timber, which had been known for years prior to the date named (1861), and their prospective values, if made accessible to the markets of the country, were understood to be well nigh beyond computation." Accordingly the costly system of highways, canals, and railways thus projected were designed, begun, and in very great measure constructed, for the purpose of developing the resources of the region afterwards embraced in the State of West Virginia, and of giving to its people adequate facilities of communication with other portions of the Commonwealth and access to the seashore and to the markets of the country.

This system of internal improvement and the large indebtedness contracted in carrying it into execution received the sanction of the people of the counties subsequently constituting West Virginia, through their representatives in the General Assembly of the undivided State, and a very large proportion of that indebtedness would not have been created but for the votes of the members of the General Assembly representing those counties; and little or none of that indebtedness would have been contracted had the representatives from the counties subsequently forming the State of West Virginia voted against its creation. Several millions of dollars of said indebtedness were contracted on account of works of internal improvement constructed in the territory now constituting West Virginia.

III.

The 9th section of the ordinance adopted by the people of the restored State of Virginia, in convention assembled in the city of Wheeling, Virginia, on the 20th day of August, 1861, entitled "An ordinance to provide for the formation of a new State out of the portion of the territory of this State," provided as follows:

> "9. The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all of the State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of said debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during said period. All private rights and interests in lands within the proposed State, derived from the laws of Virginia prior to such separation shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed State, and shall be determined by the laws now existing in the State of Virginia."

Upon this stipulation and condition, afterwards accepted and acted upon by the people of West Virginia, the consent of the Commonwealth of Virginia was given to the formation of the new State.

IV.

Before the creation of the State of West Virginia, and while the territory and the people afterwards constituting that State still formed a part of the Commonwealth of Virginia and were subject to its jurisdiction and laws, the General Assembly of the restored State of Virginia, on the 3d day of February, 1863, enacted the following law:

> "That all property, real, personal and mixed, owned by, or appertaining to this State, and being within the boundaries of the proposed State of West Virginia, when the same becomes one of the United States, shall thereupon pass to, and become the property of the State of West Virginia, and without any other assignment, conveyance or transfer or delivery than is herein contained, and shall include among other things not herein specified all lands, buildings, roads, and other internal improvements or parts thereof, situated within said boundaries, and vested in this State, or in the president and directors of the literary fund, or the board of public works thereof, or in any person or persons for the use of the State, to the extent of the interest and estate of this State therein; and shall also include the interest of this State, or of the said president and directors, or of the said board of public works, in any parent bank or branch doing business within said boundaries and all stocks of any other company or corporation, the principal office or place of business whereof is located within said boundaries, standing in the name of this State, or of the said president or directors, or of the said board of public works, or of any person or persons, for the use of this State.
>
> 5. That if the appropriations and transfers of property, stocks, and credits provided for by this act, take effect, the State of West Virginia shall duly account for the same in the settlement hereafter to be made with this State, provided that no such property, stocks and credits shall have been obtained since the reorganization of the State government."

And by another act of the General Assembly of the restored State of Virginia, passed February 4, 1863, it was enacted as follows:

> "1. That the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars be, and is hereby appropriated to the State of West Virginia out of moneys not otherwise appropriated, when the same shall have been formed, organized and admitted as one of the States of the United States.
>
> 2. That there shall be, and hereby is appropriated to the said State of West Virginia when the same shall become one of the United States, all balances, not otherwise appropriated, that may remain in the treasury, and all moneys not otherwise appropriated, that may come into the treasury up to the time when the said State of West Virginia shall become one of the United States: provided, however, that when the said State of West Virginia shall become one of the United States, it shall be the duty of the auditor of this State, to make a statement of all moneys that up to that time, have been paid into the treasury from counties located outside of the boundaries of the said State of West Virginia, and also of all moneys that up to the same time, have been expended in such counties, and the unexpended surplus of all such moneys shall remain in the treasury and continue to be the property of this State."

These two statutes of the restored government of Virginia validly prescribed the terms and conditions upon which the property and money therein mentioned should be transferred to the new State, when it should be formed; and, pursuant to their provisions, money and property amounting to and of the value of several millions of dollars were, after the formation of the new State, paid over and transferred to and accepted by West Virginia.

V.

The constitution of the State of West Virginia, which became effective when she was admitted into the Union pursuant to the said act of Congress and proclamation of President Lincoln, contained the following provisions:

By section 5 of article VIII of said Constitution it was provided:

> "5. No debt shall be contracted by this State except to meet casual deficits in the revenue, to redeem a previous liability of the State, to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, or defend the State in time of war."

And by section 7 of article VIII it was provided:

> "7. The legislature may, at any time, direct a sale of the stocks owned by the State, in banks and other corporations, but the proceeds of such sale shall be applied to the liquidation of the public debt, and hereafter the State shall not become a stockholder in any bank."

And by section 8 of article VIII it was provided:

> "8. An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

At the time the constitution containing these provisions was adopted by West Virginia that State did not owe, and could not have owed, any "public debt" or "previous liability," except for her just contributive portion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia, and for the money and property of the original State which had been transferred to and received by her under the acts of the General Assembly of the restored State of Virginia above set forth, enacted while the territory and people afterwards forming the State of West Virginia constituted a part of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

The provisions of sections 7 and 8 of article VII of said constitution were embodied therein by the people of West Virginia, or their representatives, for the purpose of complying with and carrying out in good faith the stipulations and conditions upon which the consent of Virginia was given to the formation of the State of West Virginia, and to the transfer of the money and property aforesaid to said new State.

VI.

After the formation of the State of West Virginia and after the restored government of Virginia had become the only government of the Commonwealth and its authority recognized and established throughout her limits, at intervals after the year 1865 down to and including the year 1905, various efforts were made by the Commonwealth of Virginia, through its constituted authorities, to bring about and effect an adjustment and settlement with West Virginia of the equitable proportion of the public debt of the undivided State proper to be borne and paid by the State of West Virginia. All of these efforts proved unavailing and abortive; and for years West Virginia has refused or failed to take any action or do anything for the purpose of bringing about any adjustment or settlement with this State.

Only after exhausting every means of amicable negotiation and having her overtures to that end repeatedly refused, and as a last resort, has Virginia been constrained at length reluctantly to apply to this, the only tribunal which can afford relief, for an adjudication and determination of this question, of such vast importance to her and to all of her people.

VII.

Without waiting for a settlement with West Virginia, the Commonwealth proceeded, fully recognizing her liability for an indebtedness, all of which stood in her name, soon after the establishment of its restored government at Richmond, to make provision for the settlement and payment of the portion of the common debt of the undivided State which she could be fairly expected to assume and pay, under the circumstances then existing and the conditions which confronted her.

Several efforts were made to effect such an adjustment and settlement, the most important of which was that embodied in the act of March 30, 1871, mentioned at page 7 and copied at pages 13 to 16 of the bill.

By reason of the then impoverished condition of her people, occasioned by disasters which had destroyed their resources and paralyzed their productive energies, it was soon apparent that Virginia, in assuming and capitalizing, and again recapitalizing, the accrued interest upon the debt of the original State, and undertaking to pay, with 6 per cent. interest, two-thirds of the aggregate sum thus ascertained, had assumed a heavier burden than she was able to bear. Accordingly other plans for the settlement of the State debt were adopted, and a final adjustment made under the act of February 20, 1892, set forth in the bill.

As a result of this, it will be seen that Virginia has assumed and already actually paid off and retired, exclusive of the large amounts she has paid on account of interest, a principal sum aggregating as much as, or more than, the entire principal sum of the debt of the undivided State as of January 1, 1861.

The facts in regard to these various transactions and the adjustment made by Virginia with the common creditors of the old State are recited in the bill merely for the purpose of showing the present status of the public debt of the original State and the precise relation of this Commonwealth at the present time in respect thereto.

Of course, the rights of West Virginia cannot be affected by any of these transactions between Virginia and the common creditors of the undivided State, except to the extent that Virginia's rights and action therein may entitle her to contribution from West Virginia.

VIII.

As indicating the character of the efforts and sacrifices which Virginia, notwithstanding the disasters and losses which her people have endured, has made, in order to bear and to discharge her just obligations on account of the common debt of the undivided State, and as showing something of the strength of her equitable claim against West Virginia, it must be remembered that she has actually paid off, retired, and discharged and satisfied, so far as West Virginia is concerned, as of the date of the institution of this suit, over $71,000,000, including principal and interest, on account of said common indebtedness.

While Virginia has made this large contribution towards the settlement of the common debt, West Virginia has not paid one dollar thereof.

IX.

Since January 1, 1861, the arbitrary date fixed by the Wheeling ordinance as of which the adjustment and settlement between the two States shall be made, Virginia has actually paid off or retired, and now holds in her own hands and for her own benefit, exclusive of the sums represented by the certificates issued under the funding acts aforesaid, obligations of the undivided State amounting in the aggregate, including the interest to be fairly computed thereon to date, to a sum in excess of $25,000,000. For all of the obligations and indebtedness of the original State, so taken up and retired or paid off by her, Virginia has a just claim against West Virginia for contribution to the extent of West Virginia's equitable liability therefor.

X.

As a part of the adjustment which Virginia from time to time has made with the holders of the bonds and obligations of the undivided State and as a proper stipulation in connection with the partial settlements thereof made by her, it was agreed between them and Virginia that upon giving to them respectively her obligations for the respective portions of each of the old bonds of the undivided State agreed to be assumed and paid by Virginia, these old original bonds should be deposited with Virginia, and so far as not thus funded by her in her own obligations should be held by her as trustee for the holder or his assigns; and to each of these parties thus entitled she has given her certificate to this effect.

By the terms of the settlements authorized by the acts of 1879, 1882, and 1892, set forth in the bill, no liability rests upon Virginia on account of the certificates given by her pursuant to the terms of those acts, for the bonds deposited with her, and to be held by her, to await a settlement with West Virginia, as to the portion thereof not assumed or paid by Virginia. But it has been suggested that, although there is no liability assumed by Virginia by reason of issuing said certificates or upon said certificates, that there may still be a liability upon her as to the unfunded portion of the bonds deposited with her under the acts of 1879, 1882, and 1892. This, however, is a matter of minor importance, because a comparatively small proportion of the old debt of the State was funded under the acts of 1879, 1882, and 1892, as will appear from the circumstance that there are in all only $1,609,600.15 of the certificates issued under the last-mentioned three acts outstanding in the hands of the public, as is shown by the exhibit at page 73 of the bill.

The great bulk of the debt of the old State was funded under the act of 1871, and the unfunded portion of the bonds deposited with Virginia by the public creditors under the terms of that act, amounted to $12,703,451.79, upon the principal interest-bearing sum of which there is interest due from July 1, 1871. (See Exhibit No. 1, page 13 of the bill, and statement of Second Auditor of Virginia, embodied in the address of Mr. Randolph Harrison, found at page 73 of the bill.)

The arrangement under the funding act of 1871 was very different from that provided for by the subsequent acts of 1879, 1882, and 1892.

By the acts of 1871 Virginia undertook to be the custodian of the bonds of the undivided State deposited with her, so far as they were unfunded; and that payment should "be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall hereafter be had between the States of Virginia and West Virginia in regard to the public debt of the State of Virginia existing at the time of its dismemberment."

Whatever may have been the purpose of the General Assembly of Virginia in the enactment of this law and in authorizing such contracts to be made, it would seem that Virginia's legal liability on account of said unfunded portion of said bonds is not released or affected by the transaction, but still exists.

However, under all the circumstances of the case and in view of the underlying equities suggested by the facts stated in the bill, it would seem that Virginia has already unquestionably done as much as she could be fairly expected to do towards paying off the common public debt of the old State. The great mass of the holders of the certificates issued by her under the act of 1871, and under the other acts above recited, who are the persons entitled to the said unfunded bonds deposited with her and now held by her, recognizing the justice of this view, have, through their authorized representatives, entered into the agreement printed at pages 83 to 86 of the bill.

XI.

By joint resolution of the General Assembly of Virginia, printed as Exhibit No. 5, beginning at page 39 of the bill, entitled—

> "A joint resolution to provide for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia proper to be borne by West Virginia, for the application of whatever may be received from West Virginia to the payment of those found to be entitled to the same," approved March 6, 1894, a commission was created for the purposes set forth in the title to the resolution.

The Virginia Debt Commission mentioned in the bill was created pursuant to that resolution, and made earnest efforts to bring about a settlement with West Virginia, without any satisfactory result.

Accordingly the General Assembly of Virginia afterwards passed the act approved March 6, 1900, printed as Exhibit No. 6 of the bill, beginning at page 41 thereof, the object of which is stated in its title as follows:

> "An act to provide for the settlement with West Virginia of the proportion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia proper to be borne by West Virginia, and for the due protection of the Commonwealth of Virginia in the premises."

By this act, as plainly appears from its terms, additional powers and authority were conferred upon this commission, and it was made its duty, and power was conferred upon it, by and with the advice and approval of the Attorney-General of the State, to take such action and institute such proceedings on behalf of the State as may, in the judgment of said commission and Attorney-General, be needful and proper to protect the interest of the State and bring about and carry into effect a settlement as aforesaid.

After again making an earnest effort to bring about an amicable settlement with West Virginia, by which the proportion of the debt of the original State of Virginia proper to be borne by West Virginia should be ascertained, and after having had their overtures to that end rejected by West Virginia, the said commission deemed it to be its duty, with the advice and approval of the Attorney-General of Virginia, to cause this suit to be brought in strict conformity with the powers conferred upon them by the acts aforesaid, the commission and the Attorney-General considering such action to be needful and proper to protect the interest of the State and bring about and carry into effect such a settlement.

Accordingly, and in strict conformity with the authority conferred by the act of March 6, 1900, this suit was instituted.

BRIEF OF ARGUMENT UPON THE QUESTIONS OF LAW PRESENTED BY THE DEMURRERS.

(1.)

As to the first ground alleged in the amended demurrer, namely, that there is a misjoinder of parties plaintiff and a misjoinder of causes of action, we cannot see that this objection is well taken.

The definitions of misjoinder under English chancery practice, as well as the practice in this country, show that there is no such vice in the bill:

(a) As to the misjoinder of parties: This does not arise unless—

>
> Mitf. Pl., p. 399, note.

The rule as to misjoinder of plaintiffs, as laid down by Mr. Daniell, is that—

> "persons who have no interest in the litigation cannot be joined as coplaintiffs in a suit with those who have."
>
> 1st Daniell Chy. (5th Am. ed.), m. p. 301.

Example given by Mr. Daniell of what is not misjoinder; Auctioneer can be joined as coplaintiff with the vender in a bill against the purchaser.

Id., m. p. 302.

Again: Want of interest by a coplaintiff in the subject-matter is ground of demurrer.

Story's Eq. Pl., sections 231, 232, 508, and 509.

Mitf. Pl., 160, 161.

Again: Plaintiffs who have no common interest, but assert distinct and several claims against one and the same defendant, cannot be joined.

Story's Eq. Pl., section 279.

On the other hand, where there is a community of interests among coplaintiffs desiring the same relief against a common defendant, they may be joined.

It was held in Ware vs. Duke of Northumberland, 2 Anstruther's Rep., p. 469, that:

> "Unconnected parties might be joined in one suit where there was a common interest among them all, centering in the point in issue in the cause."

This doctrine is strongly approved by Chancellor Kent in Brickenhoff et als. vs. Browns, where different judgment creditors united in one bill for discovery and account to set aside impediments to their remedies at law caused by the fraudulent acts of their common debtor.

6 Johnson Chy., 139, 151, 152.

Chancellor Kent says at page 151:

> "It is an ordinary case in this court, for creditors to unite, or for one or more, on behalf of themselves and the rest, to sue the representative of their debtor in possession of the assets, and to seek an account of the estate.
>
> "This is done to prevent a multiplicity of suits, a very favorite object with this court; and this principle so far controls the other rule, which preserves, in some degree, an analogy between pleadings in chancery, and the simplicity of declarations at common law. There is no sound reason for requiring the judgment creditors to separate their suits, when they have one common object in view, which, in fact, governs the whole case." (Italics here and elsewhere ours).

Story's Eq. Pl., section 286; see also 2d Story's Eq. Jur., sections 853, 854.

(b) Nor is there any foundation whatever for the objection that there is a misjoinder of causes of action.

Considering together the two grounds of objection which are jointly presented in the first assignment of grounds of demurrer made in the amended demurrer in the light of the established doctrines and definitions, we beg leave to say that they are both founded upon an utter misapprehension of the meaning, scope, and purpose of the bill.

It is impossible that there can be any misjoinder of parties plaintiff, because there is only one party plaintiff. Virginia, in her corporate capacity, is the only plaintiff in the suit. She does not sue in any representative capacity, though the bill discloses the fact that, by reason of the arrangements which she has made with the great mass of the holders of the bonds of the old State, she does hold in her possession nearly all of those bonds as a depository, and quoad the custody thereof that she holds them in a fiduciary capacity; but she does not sue as trustee, but sues in her own name, for the purpose of obtaining the equitable relief to which the bill shows that she is fairly entitled.

In so far as said bonds have been funded in her own obligations and discharged by her, she holds those bonds as vouchers and evidence of her satisfaction of the same against the State of West Virginia, who is, as a proposition of public law and of equity, bound jointly with her to the public creditors to pay the same, and, as between her and West Virginia, is bound by contract to pay West Virginia's equitable proportion thereof.

If Virginia had no personal interest in respect to the bonds so deposited and held by her in a fiduciary capacity, we would cheerfully concede that she would have no standing to maintain this suit in respect to these bonds; but Virginia not only has an interest, but a very great interest, in respect to the unfunded and unsatisfied bonds of the old State, which, confiding in her fair dealing, the public creditors have entrusted to her custody, and in the settlement by

West Virginia of her fair equitable proportion of the indebtedness of the undivided State represented by these bonds; and that interest is that she shall be exonerated, at least to the extent of West Virginia's liability therefor, from any obligation to pay the same.

To obtain such just exoneration she has invoked the equitable jurisdiction of this court.

Not only is she entitled to maintain and prosecute this suit, in order to obtain the exoneration which, according to the general principles of equity she is entitled to be decreed, but, by the special contract between her and the parties entitled to these bonds, she has, without any prejudice to the rights of West Virginia or any violation of any duty she owes to West Virginia, and without doing anything of which West Virginia has any ground whatever for complaint, acquired a still greater interest and right, namely, to be entirely exonerated from any liability on account of the unfunded portion of the common debt represented by the bonds so deposited with her and by the certificates which she has issued therefor.

This interest is given to her by the express terms of the contract which she has made with these certificate-holders, who are the owners of the bonds of which she is the custodian, and who, recognizing the enormous contributions which she has made from her limited means to the satisfaction of the common debt, have cheerfully agreed to accept whatever amount this court shall ascertain to be the just and equitable proportion of the common debt of the old State to be borne by West Virginia, in full discharge and satisfaction of any claim they may have against Virginia and in full acquittance of all demands against her. (See 4th clause of contract, p. 85 of bill.)

It will be observed that, as has been already suggested, this stipulation, though it enures to the protection and to the interest of Virginia, in no sense and by no possibility is or can be prejudicial to any right of West Virginia; for under no circumstances could or will this agreement operate to add one cent to the liability of West Virginia.

We respectfully submit that her equitable right to exoneration from liability as to these unsatisfied and unfunded bonds, of which she is the custodian, alone gives her a standing to maintain this suit to have West Virginia's liability, not only for the whole indebtedness of the undivided State, but for the bonds so deposited with her, ascertained, determined, and adjudicated; and that her contractual right to exoneration under her agreement with the parties equitably entitled to those bonds increases her interest and confirms her right to have such exoneration decreed.

An authority of respectability and of proven merit has said:

> "It was not necessary to wait till some one was damnified by having paid, or having claim made against him for the whole; a bill might be filed to settle the amount due from each individual of a body liable to a common burden, and to compel the payment by each, of his share."
>
> 2 Spence Equitable Juris., marginal p. 662.

The suit is brought, as appears plainly from the bill, for the purpose of obtaining a complete settlement with West Virginia and an adjustment of a controversy which has vexed both States for a generation past; and as a part of this settlement and as a necessary incident to it, and in accordance with the manifest equitable rights of Virginia to have that settlement decreed—

First, in respect to some $25,000,000, including principal and interest, of the obligations of the original State, which have been paid off or retired by the Commonwealth of Virginia since her dismemberment and the vouchers for which transaction she now holds in her treasury; and as to this she invokes the equitable jurisdiction of this court for contribution from West Virginia to the extent of West Virginia's liability on account of the common obligations which Virginia has thus paid off and retired; and,

Second, to obtain the exoneration to which she is entitled in respect to the unsettled and unfunded one-third of the debt of the undivided State, the obligations evidencing which have been deposited with her.

There is no possible conflict between or inconsistency in the two kindred and associated rights of contribution and of exoneration thus possessed by Virginia, or in the assertion of the same in one common suit. Indeed, it is proper and right that they should be asserted and united in one suit, and it would be ground of objection not to include them in one suit.

This would be true, even if there were more than one party, who had such rights, plaintiff to the bill; but, in the nature of things, there is and can be but one party plaintiff here, because there is only one Commonwealth of Virginia; and, as to her, "there is a common interest centering in the point of issue in the cause," and, in every phase and aspect of the cause, a common right in her capacity as a creditor of West Virginia in respect to so much of the common debt as Virginia has settled and paid off in full, and in her capacity of co-obligor of West Virginia as to so much of the common debt as remains unsatisfied, to have a settlement and ascertainment and adjudication of the equitable proportion of the debt of the undivided States which West Virginia should pay.

The effect and logical consequence of such an ascertainment and adjudication will necessarily be to obtain contribution to Virginia by West Virginia to the extent of West Virginia's equitable liability to make such contribution, and to obtain the exoneration of Virginia from any farther liability on account of the common debt of the old State; and this is the ultimate relief to which Virginia is justly and equitably entitled, upon the showing made by her bill.

Again, the two causes of complaint united in this bill, and on which relief is prayed, are:

1. The liability of West Virginia to Virginia for her reasonable and just contributive share of the public debt of Virginia as of the 1st of January, 1861.

This liability rests upon several distinct and evident grounds:

(a) On the principle of public law, that "where a State is divided into two or more States, in the adjustment of liabilities between each other the debts of the parent State should be ratably apportioned among them" (Hartman vs. Greenhow, 102 U. S., 877.

(b) On the ordinance of the convention of Virginia of August 20, 1861, "to provide for the formation of a new State out of the portion of the territory of this State," by section 9 of which ordinance it was provided that "the new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861," &c.

(c) On the constitution formed by the State of West Virginia and submitted to Congress, and on which West Virginia was admitted into the Union (Virginia vs. West Virginia, 11 Wall, 43).

By section 8 of article 8 of said constitution it was provided that—

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

2. Under and by virtue of the act of the General Assembly of the restored government of Virginia, passed February 3, 1863, property of the Commonwealth of Virginia, to the amount in value of several millions of dollars, was transferred from Virginia, and was delivered to and received by West Virginia, on the express condition that "the State of West Virginia shall duly account for the same in the settlement hereafter to be made with this State, provided that no such property stocks and credits shall have been obtained since the organization of the State government."

And by act of the same General Assembly, passed February 4, 1863, the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars ($150,000) was appropriated and subsequently paid over to West Virginia, and by the same act all moneys and balances in the treasury of Virginia not otherwise appropriated were appropriated to the said State of West Virginia.

It is too plain and obvious to be questioned, that both of the two above-recited grounds of complaint grew out of and formed material parts of the same transaction, viz., the generation of the new State of West Virginia and its necessary sustenance and support while in her infancy. By her very birth, West Virginia incurred the liability for her just proportion of the public debt of Virginia. It was in fact and in law her debt as much as it was the debt of Virginia. She inherited it. It was congenital. Then, at her birth, West Virginia was wholly without resources or means for maintaining herself and continuing her political existence twenty-four hours save by the money and property of Virginia which fell into her hands. The appropriation of this money and property to the uses of West Virginia created a debt of so high an obligation that, even without the express condition on which it was given and received, she would be compelled to account for it.

Can there be doubt, then, for one moment that these two grounds of complaint are so intimately and essentially connected as that, had this complainant brought her separate bill on each ground, this court would, to avoid so useless multiplicity of actions, have consolidated or caused them to be heard together? The people who appeared as the citizens of the restored government of Virginia and who formed the conventions and General Assemblys by which ordinances were framed for the creation of the new State of West Virginia—and consent was given in the name of Virginia for the creation of such new State—and who appropriated millions of dollars in value of the property of Virginia for the use of West Virginia were, it may be, in legal contemplation, citizens of Virginia up to the 20th day of June, 1863; but on that day these same people became citizens of West Virginia and thenceforth sat in conventions of her people and in her halls of legislation. But before this transformation took place, and in contemplation of its assured coming, they, as citizens of Virginia, appropriated all her property within their reach and gave it to the embryo State.

So it appears by the allegations of this bill, which must be taken here to be true, that West Virginia is justly liable on many grounds for a just proportion of the public debt of her parent State, Virginia; that West Virginia has not only repudiated and openly disavowed all such liability, but that she has appropriated to her own use a large amount in value of the public property of Virginia, which Virginia might properly have applied, as part of her public assets, to the payment of her public debt; and now, when by this bill in equity Virginia calls on West Virginia to account for the property which she has appropriated and applied to her own uses, and to come in before this court and have her proportion of the public debt ascertained, West Virginia, by her demurrer, protests that the part of the public debt which she owes and the part of the public assets which she has appropriated to her own use are two subjects of complaint so distinct and unconnected as should relieve her from making answer to the bill.

Counsel for the defendant rely upon the decision of this court in the cases of New York vs. Louisiana and New Hampshire vs. Louisiana, 108 U. S., 78; but, as has already been made apparent, this case is entirely different in fact and in principle from those cases; indeed, there is no analogy between them.

Neither the State of New York or New Hampshire had any direct or personal interest in the bonds of Louisiana or in the subject-matters of controversy in those suits, but were mere volunteers, self-constituted trustees, without sustaining any relation, or interest, or obligation, or liability in regard to the bonds, or to any question presented in those causes.

While it may be true that, as to the custody of some of these unsatisfied bonds, Virginia sustains the relation of trustee, she has an enormous interest as to those bonds—an interest as substantial and as real, if not in fact as great, as if she had actually paid these bonds in full.

The next ground of demurrer assigned by the defendant is:

> "That this court has no jurisdiction of either the parties to or the subject-matter of this action, because it appears by the said bill that the matters therein set forth do not constitute, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, such a controversy, or such controversies, between the Commonwealth of Virginia and the State of West Virginia as can be heard and determined in this court, and this court has no power to render or enforce any final judgment or decree thereon."

This ground of objection is based upon two postulates, each of which, we respectfully submit, is fallacious as applied to this case.

The first is, as we understand the position of defendant's counsel, that the judicial power of the United States and the jurisdiction conferred by section 2 of article III of the Constitution of the United States upon the Supreme Court over "controversies between two or more States" does not embrace a controversy such as is presented here, or any other controversy which, like the one here, is based upon any pecuniary obligation or liability of a State; that while it does confer jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court of the United States over certain controversies between States, the word "controversy" as used in that section of the Constitution, does not embrace any controversy in regard to any pecuniary matter.

The second postulate which defendant's counsel must maintain to support the above objection is necessarily that the language of the Constitution referred to does not confer jurisdiction in any case in which the court has no power to render or enforce and make effective its final judgment thereon, and that this court cannot render or enforce its final judgment or decree making effective the relief sought by the plaintiff.

We will now consider this two fold ground of objection:

(a) Can it be true that the word "controversy" as thus used in section 2 of article III of the Constitution can be fairly given any such narrow construction and confined by any such forced and restricted limitations?

It will be observed that precisely the same word defines the jurisdiction of this court as to "controversies between citizens of different States."

Judge St. George Tucker, in discussing the judiciary clauses of the United States Constitution, says, in his appendix to Tucker's Blackstone, vol. 1, p. 120, edition of 1802:

> "The word 'controversies,' as here used, must be understood as relating to such as are of civil nature. It is probably unknown in any other sense, as I do not recollect ever to have heard the expression 'criminal controversy.' As here applied, it seems particularly appropriated to such disputes as might arise between the United States and any one or more States, respecting territorial or fiscal matters; or between the United States and their debtors, contractors > and agents. This construction is confirmed by the application of the word in the ensuing clauses, where it evidently refers to disputes of a civil nature only, such, for example, as may arise between two or more States, or between citizens of different States, or between a State and the citizen of another State, none of which could possibly be supposed to relate to such as are of a criminal nature."

It is to be presumed that the framers of the Constitution did not design by the use of the same identical expression to confer one jurisdiction upon the federal courts as to matters of dispute between States and another jurisdiction as to matters of dispute between citizens of different States. In other words, if the words "controversies between two or more States" do not embrace, under any circumstances, in the one case controversies growing out of contracts or liabilities for the payment of money, the words "controversies between citizens of different States" cannot be fairly construed to embrace any controversies of a pecuniary character; and yet we are surely within limits when we say that a large majority of the "controversies between citizens of different States" of which the federal courts have from their foundation taken jurisdiction have been controversies arising out of contracts for the payment of money.

But it is urged that it is derogatory to the dignity of a State to have it impleaded in any court upon any contract, or obligation or promise which a State may have made.

Whether this be true or not is immaterial, if it be true (and as to this there can be no question) that the States, by coming into the Union and accepting the Constitution of the United States as their supreme law, have agreed to submit their controversies to the supreme tribunal created by that Constitution and clothed by it with jurisdiction of just such controversies.

And is it any more derogatory to the dignity of a State for it to be impleaded in this impartial tribunal in a controversy involving such important and far-reaching questions of public obligation and of public right as are presented in this cause than it would be to be impleaded in this court upon the question as to whether one State had encroached upon the territorial limits of another State; or as to whether it was improperly allowing its citizens to pollute the waters flowing through its territory and by the territory of another State, or that it was in violation of the rights of a neighboring State, diverting, dissipating, and absorbing streams of water rising in one State and preventing their natural flow into the territory of another State; or that it was doing any one of the things for which States have been impleaded under jurisdiction recognized and approved by this Court?

We are unable to see that there is any surrender of the dignity of a State in that it submits, or, if recalcitrant, is compelled to submit, its controversies to the adjudication of a tribunal of its own creation and selection for the settlement of any question of controversy involving property rights, or any other direct interests of a State in its corporate capacity, or of the people of a State represented by the government of the State.

It is urged that a State cannot be sued without her consent; but, as has been repeatedly decided by this court, all of the States have, in most solemn form, given their consent to the jurisdiction of this court over all civil controversies which may arise between them.

A careful review of all of the decisions of this court which throw light upon this subject, we think, justifies us in the view that this is no longer a debatable question.

The word "controversy" as used in this section of the Constitution has been repeatedly passed upon and interpreted by this court. Not only has its meaning been fixed by this court in approving the jurisdiction taken by the circuit courts of the United States of hundreds of controversies of a pecuniary character "between citizens of different States, but it has been repeatedly given a similar significance and interpretation, and the jurisdiction of this court sustained in respect to controversies to which States were parties and in respect to controversies to which the United States has been a party, as to which the definition and limitation of the jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution is defined by precisely the same word, "controversies." And so we say that, if this court has no jurisdiction of any controversies arising out of demands for money, or obligations for the payment of money, between States, then neither this court nor any other federal court could have jurisdiction of any such pecuniary "controversy between citizens of different States," or of controversies to which a State is a party, or of a controversy to which the United States is a party, for in each case the jurisdiction is conferred by precisely the same language.

And such we understand to be the doctrine established by the decisions of this court.

The first case in which this question arose was that of Chisholm, ex'r, vs. Georgia, 2 Dal., p. 419, in which this court held that the judicial power of the United States and the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, as conferred by section 2, article III of the Constitution, embraced a demand for money asserted against a State by a citizen of another State in an ordinary action of assumpsit, and that such a case presented a "controversy" within the meaning of that section of the Constitution.

Mr. Justice Iredell alone dissented, not as to the construction given by the majority of the court to the word "controversy," but as to the decision of the majority of the court in construing section 2 of article III so as to extend the jurisdiction of the federal courts to a pecuniary demand asserted by a citizen of one State against another State. He held and argued that the language used in the Constitution, taken as a whole and construed in the light of the historical facts which he mentioned, was not designed to give the federal courts jurisdiction of a suit by any individual against a sovereign State upon any merely pecuniary demand: but it is an exceedingly significant circumstance that Mr. Justice Iredell was constrained to hold, and he did declare, that—> "The Supreme Court hath, therefore, first, exclusive jurisdiction in every controversy of a civil nature: 1st. Between two or more States. 2d. Between a State and a foreign State. 3d. Where a suit or proceeding is depending against ambassadors, other public ministers, or their domestics, or domestic servants. Second. Original, but not exclusive jurisdiction, 1st, between a State and citizens of other States. 2d. Between a State and foreign citizens or subjects. 3d. Where a suit is brought by ambassadors, or other public ministers. 4th. Where a consul or vice-consul, is a party."

>
> Id., p. 431.

Had that suit, like this, been a suit between two States; had that been a suit by South Carolina vs. Georgia, upon a demand for money, there cannot be a doubt but that this court, as then constituted, would have unanimously maintained its jurisdiction. And such is the meaning and effect of the decision of all the Judges.

It may be fairly claimed that the ruling of the majority of the court in Chisholm, ex'r, vs. Georgia has been questioned, if not overruled, as to the suability of a State by any private citizen independently of the eleventh amendment, and the opinion of Mr. Justice Iredell in that case affirmed by the opinion of this court, as formulated by Mr. Justice Bradley in Hans vs. Louisiana, 134 U. S., p. 1; but it will be seen that Mr. Justice Bradley, in the interesting opinion referred to, affirms and approves the opinion and the views of Mr. Justice Iredell in the Chisholm case; and Mr. Justice Iredell, in his opinion so unqualifiedly affirmed, as we have seen, held that this court had jurisdiction "in every controversy of a civil nature between two or more States," though he held that jurisdiction was not conferred upon it of a controversy between an individual plaintiff suing a State upon a pecuniary demand.

There can be no doubt that the decision and reasoning of all the judges in the case of Chisholm, ex'r, vs. Georgia confirms every contention made for the plaintiff in this case as to the rightful and necessary jurisdiction of this court over a controversy of the kind presented here between the Commonwealth of Virginia and the State of West Virginia.

The question of the nature and extent of the jurisdiction conferred upon this court by article III of the Constitution in respect to controversies to which a State is a party, and also as to controversies between two or more States, was exhaustively discussed by Chief Justice Marshall in Cohens vs. Virginia, 6 Wheat., pp. 364, 375-440.

In considering the effect of the adoption of the 11th amendment upon that jurisdiction the Chief Justice, at pages 405-6, says:

> "This leads to a consideration of the 11th amendment.
>
> "It is in these words: 'The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States, by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State.'
>
> "It is a part of our history, that, at the adoption of the Constitution, all the States were greatly indebted; and the apprehension that these debts might be prosecuted in the federal courts formed a very serious objection to that instrument. Suits were instituted; and the court maintained its jurisdiction. The alarm was general; and, to quiet the apprehensions that were so extensively entertained, this amendment was proposed in Congress, and adopted by the State legislatures. That its motive was not to maintain the sovereignty of a State from the degradation supposed to attend a compulsory appearance before the tribunal of the nation, may be inferred from the terms of the amendment. It does not comprehend controversies between two or more States, or between a State and a foreign State. The jurisdiction of the court still extends to these cases; and in these a state > may still be sued. We must ascribe the amendment, then, to some other cause than the dignity of a State. There is no difficulty in finding this cause. Those who were inhibited from commencing a suit against a State, or from prosecuting one which might be commenced before the adoption of the amendment, were persons who might probably be its creditors. There was not much reason to fear that foreign or sister states would be creditors to any considerable amount, and there was reason to retain the jurisdiction of the court in those cases, because it might be essential to the preservation of peace. The amendment, therefore, extended to suits commenced or prosecuted by individuals, but not to those brought by States."

And at page 378, in defining the jurisdiction of this court in the class of cases in which its jurisdiction by the terms of the Constitution is determined by the character of the parties, the Chief Justice uses this language, which would seem to be conclusive as applied to this case:

> "In the second class, the jurisdiction depends entirely on the character of the parties. In this are comprehended 'controversies between two or more States, between a State and citizens of another State, and between a State and foreign States, citizens or subjects.' If these be the parties, it is entirely unimportant what may be the subject of controversy. Be it what it may, these parties have a constitutional right to come into the courts of the Union."

It has been argued that these rulings of the Chief Justice were obiter dicta. They were entirely pertinent to the great question which he was considering and had a direct bearing upon it. The question which the court had to review was what was the character of the controversies over which it had jurisdiction under article III of the Constitution, after the adoption of the 11th amendment; and it was necessary in that connection for the court to construe the word "controversy" as used in that article.

The opinion was one of the most lucid and ablest which ever came from the mind of the great Chief Justice. It was evidently well and carefully considered.

Under such circumstances a conclusion which he so deliberately reached and so clearly expressed ought to have the greatest weight.

It may also be justly claimed that the expressions in opinions in two or three later cases, which are claimed to be inconsistent with the views of Chief Justice Marshall, are all of them far more emphatically obiter than were his conclusions as above quoted.

It is to be presumed, of course, that the controversies to which the Chief Justice referred were controversies in a juridical sense; that is to say, justiciable controversies; but where has it ever been held by any court anywhere that a controversy arising out of a contract for the payment of money was not justiciable?

Since money supplanted barter in the dealings and contracts of mankind, and since courts for the adjudication of civil controversies have been established, a great part of the disputes which have grown out of the contracts of mankind have been controversies about the payment of money. They have not only been "solvable" by the courts, but they are generally more reaily "solvable," for principles of justice and right and more adequate relief can usually be administered in respect to them than in respect to some other descriptions of controversy which have been held to be justiciable by this court. For instance, the prevention of the flow of polluted water from the State under whose authority it has been contaminated, along the borders of another State, the health of whose inhabitants is prejudiced by the flow of such polluted water by their shores, as in Missouri vs. Illinois, 180 U. S., p. 208; or the prevention of the undue retarding and diminution of the natural flow of rivers by the State in which they have their source into the State through which they have their natural exit, as in Kansas vs. Colorado, 185 U. S., p. 125; or, indeed, the establishment of a disputed boundary line between coterminous States, as in Rhode Island vs. Massachusetts, and a number of later cases where this court has taken jurisdiction of such controversies.

In Missouri vs. Illinois, 180 U. S., 240, Mr. Justice Shiras, after reviewing at great length the cases decided under the constitutional provision giving this court original jurisdiction in controversies between two States says:

> "The cases cited show that such jurisdiction has been exercised in cases involving boundaries and jurisdiction over lands and their inhabitants, and in cases directly affecting the property, rights and interests of a State. But such cases manifestly do not cover the entire field in which such controversies may arise, and for which the Constitution has provided a remedy; and it would be objectionable, and indeed, impossible, for the court to anticipate by definition what controversies can and what cannot be brought within the original jurisdiction of this court."

This question has been directly passed upon by this court and its jurisdiction over controversies arising upon pecuniary demands has been sustained in—

Georgia vs. Brailsford, 2 Del., p. 402;
Texas vs. White, 7 Wal., p. 700;
Florida vs. Anderson, 91 U. S., p. 667;
Alabama vs. Burr et als., 115 U. S., p. 413; and even more emphatically and conclusively in—

United States vs. North Carolina, 136 U. S., p. 211; United States vs. Texas, 143 U. S., p. 621; and United States vs. Michigan, 190 U. S., pp. 379, 396, 406.

The three last cases would seem to be entirely decisive of the question.

The very language under which this court took jurisdiction of these cases, all involving pecuniary demands of the United States against the several defendant States, is used in the Constitution to confer jurisdiction upon this court of controversies between States; and if that language in the one case gave this court jurisdiction of a controversy arising out of, or asserted upon, a pecuniary demand, by a logical and inevitable consequence it gives this court jurisdiction of a similar controversy between States.

It may possibly be contended that the question of jurisdiction was not raised in United States vs. North Carolina, 136 U. S., p. 211, but such a contention would be idle, because this court, and no other federal court, according to the uniform decisions of this court, can, even by consent of parties, exercise jurisdiction in any case in which such jurisdiction has not been conferred upon it by the Constitution or by valid act of Congress.

This question arose in United States vs. Texas, 143 U. S., p. 621, supra, where, at page 642, this court, through Mr. Justice Harlan delivering its opinion, said:

> "The cases in this court show that the framers of the Constitution did provide, by that instrument, for the judicial determination of all cases in law and equity between two or more States, including those involving questions of boundary. Did they omit to provide for the judicial determination of controversies arising between the United States and one or more of the States of the Union? This question is in effect answered by United States v. North Carolina, 136 U. S., 211. That was an action of debt brought in this court by the United States against the State of North Carolina, upon certain bonds issued by that State. The State appeared, the case was determined here upon its merits, and judgment was rendered for the State. It is true that no question was made as to the jurisdiction of this court, and nothing was therefore said in the opinion upon that subject. But it did not escape the attention of the court, and the judgment would not have been rendered except upon the theory that this court has original jurisdiction of a suit by the United States against a State."

And it unquestionably arose and was passed upon in United States vs. Michigan, 190 U. S., pp. 379, 396, 406, which was a suit for the recovery of money, in which this court, Mr. Justice Peckham delivering its unanimous opinion, at page 396 held:

> "By its bill the United States invokes the original jurisdiction of this court for the purpose of determining a controversy existing between it and the State of Michigan. This court has jurisdiction of such a controversy, although it is not literally between two States, the United States being a party on the one side and a State on the other. This was decided in United States v. Texas, 143 U. S., 621, 642; 36 L. Ed., 285, 292; 12 Sup. Ct. Rep., 488."

Such was also the effect of the decision of the majority of the court in South Dakota vs. North Carolina, 192 U. S., p. 286; and there is nothing in the dissenting opinion of the minority of the court in that case inconsistent with the views for which we contend.

Again, we say that it seems to us the question is no longer a debatable one in this court.

(b) Is there anything in the contention that this court cannot hear and determine the questions presented in this case because it has, as is alleged, no power to render or enforce any final judgment or decree therein?

Let us see, first, what is the precise character of this suit and what is the relief sought, a total misconception of which must have occasioned the assignment of the ground of demurrer now being considered.

The main and real object of the suit is a settlement with West Virginia, and to this end a determination and adjudication by this court of the amount due by that State to Virginia, upon the state of facts set forth in the bill.

West Virginia having refused to have any accounting, or even to negotiate with Virginia upon the subject, it became necessary to invoke the equitable jurisdiction of this court in order that it might ascertain, determine, and adjudge the proportion of the debt of the original State which it would be equitable for West Virginia to pay.

The Commonwealth of Virginia would be loath to believe that any State of the American Union would disregard or disobey any decree of this, the tribunal selected and empowered by all of the States as the final arbiter of all civil controversies which may arise between them, and did not consider it necessary in any such case, or proper under the circumstances of this case, to insert in her bill a special prayer asking this court to summarily enforce its decree against West Virginia.

She cherishes the hope that there would never be any occasion to ask the court to award any execution or take any action for the purpose of enforcing such judgment as it shall render.

If such occasion should ever arise, it will be for the court to then decide by what process or further action it would proceed to execute its decree.

It will be time enough when the proper accounts have been taken, and the balance ascertained, and the sovereign State against whom such balance may be found has repudiated the liability and refused to pay such balance, to consider and decide whether the power resides in this court and the means are at its hand to enforce the payment of the amount so found to be due.

It is enough for present purposes to know that all the States in the Union have, by the Constitution of their general Government, covenanted and agreed in the most solemn form that "the judicial power shall extend to controversies between two or more States," and that "in all those cases in which a State shall be a party the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction."

> "The Constitution of the United States, with all the powers conferred by it on the General Government and surrendered by the States, was the voluntary act of the people of the several States, deliberately done, for their own protection and safety against injustice from one another."

Ableman vs. Booth, 21 How., p. 521.

"Some tribunal exercising such authority, is essential to prevent an appeal to the sword and a dissolution of the Government."

2 Story on Constitution, sec. 1681.

The Supreme Court hath exclusive jurisdiction in every controversy of a civil nature between two or more States.

Chisholm vs. Georgia, 2 Dall., 2d ed., p. 430.

These cases hold that questions of boundary, territorial right, and property rights of all kinds are proper for this jurisdiction.

2 Tucker's Constitution, p. 784.

Indeed it may be needless to consider at all the question of whether, when a decree shall be made ascertaining the amount due by West Virginia, on a full adjustment and accounting between the two States, how such amount can be obtained from the debtor State. We may accept as sound and true the statement made by Mr. Webster in his letter to Baring Brothers (Webster's Works, vol. 6, p. 539), that "the security for State loans is the plighted faith of the State as a political community, resting on the same basis as other contracts with established governments; that is to say, the good faith of the government making the loan, and its ability to fulfill engagements." We may admit that this is the only sanction and security on which an individual who is a public creditor may rely; that this arises on the creation of the debt and continues so long as the debt exists. We recognize that no sovereign State, of whatever form of government, can clothe an individual or another State with power to seize by force upon its treasury and appropriate its resources without regard to the needs, policies, or will of the debtor State.

Every day judgments are rendered by this court against the United States for money demands on appeals from the Court of Claims; but nowhere is power given to this court to award execution of fiere facias against the United States. Awards are made by high tribunals and commissions to whose arbitrament claims for money against empires, kingdoms, and republics have been submitted, but never has power been given to these courts to enforce by judicial process or physical force the payment or satisfaction of the amounts which they may ascertain to be due.

Only by appropriation, regularly made by the legislative branch of the Government, is provision ever made for the payment of claims, whether ascertained by judgment, award, or other legal form. To that branch of the Government alone may we look for the fulfillment of "the good faith of the Government."

We here invoke the exercise of a long-established ground of equitable jurisdiction when, on the case stated in the bill, we ask that an accounting be had, and that such other and further relief be granted as the nature of the case may require and in equity may be meet.

It is true that in the case of Gordon vs. United States the Supreme Court declined to take jurisdiction of the case on appeal from the final action of the Court of Claims, on the ground that no power had been conferred upon the court to enforce its judgment, Chief Justice Taney in the opinion saying:

> "nor can Congress authorize or require this court to express an opinion on a case where its judicial power could not be exercised and where its judgment would not be final and conclusive on the rights of the parties, and process of execution awarded to carry it into effect.
>
> "The award of execution is a part, and an essential part, of every judgment passed by a court exercising judicial power. It is no judgment, in the legal sense of the term, without it. Without such an award the judgment would be inoperative and nugatory, leaving the aggrieved party without a remedy," &c.

Gordon vs. United States (Appendix), 117 U. S., p. 697.

(Although a grave doubt exists as to the authenticity and accuracy of this alleged opinion.)

This language was used in considering and deciding a question of jurisdiction of the Court of Claims where the judicial power of the United States had not been conferred on it by Congress. It is not applicable to the question presented here, which is not as to the jurisdiction of the court, but as to its power to enforce its writ of execution against a State. The question here is not as to the power of the arm to strike, but as to the immunity of the object from wounds.

Whether property or funds of West Virginia within the jurisdiction of this court, other than property used distinctly for governmental purposes, would be liable to seizure, levy, garnishment, or sale in execution of or for the purpose of coercing compliance with any such decree is a question which we trust will never arise; for we are persuaded that any decree which this court shall render will be accepted by both parties as final and binding and will be respected and obeyed. But if a decree shall be rendered against West Virginia, and that State shall fail or refuse to respect it and to comply with its terms, it will be time enough then for this court to decide what farther action shall be taken in the enforcement of its decree.

The supreme court of Louisiana, in the case of Carter vs. State, 42 La. Annual, 930, in an opinion delivered by Judge Fenner, has shown why, from the character of the party, a writ of fieri facias should not be awarded, and cannot be enforced against a State.

"Legislative acts authorizing individuals to sue the State upon claims which the Legislature, for any cause, does not see fit to recognize and pay, have been of common occurrence in this and in other States. Their purpose and effect, as commonly understood, are undoubtedly nothing more than to refer to the judiciary the settlement of the questions of law and fact involved in the claims, and the determination, in the form of a judgment, of the rights of the parties. It is implied, as a matter of course, that the legislative power, after making such a reference, will accept and abide by the judicial determination, will recognize the judgment rendered as final and conclusive, and will, in due and ordinary course, make provision for the satisfaction thereof.

"That such was the interpretation of his remedy, adopted by the plaintiff himself, is evinced by his applications to successive General Assemblies for an appropriation to satisfy his judgment.

"But to assume that, by consenting to be sued, the Legislature intended to abdicate its constitutional function of controlling and administering the public funds and property and of appropriating them to such lawful purposes as it may deem best, and to delegate to the judicial department the power of seizing such property and applying it to the payment of a particular debt, would be, beyond measure, rash and unjustifiable. No such intention is expressed in the act or can be fairly implied from its terms; and we consider it beyond question that no such ever entered into the mind of any member of the legislative body. The incidents and appurtenances of ordinary jurisdiction have no application to a case like this. Undoubtedly jurisdiction granted to render judgments between parties subject to judicial power and control implies power to execute such judgments. But the sovereign is not subject to judicial power and control, except just so far as it has consented thereto; the moment the limit of that consent is reached the judiciary must instantly halt. Satisfied as we are that the Legislature has not consented and did not intend to consent to the execution of this judgment by writ of fieri facias, we are bound to deny such remedy.

"Counsel asks, of what use is the power to render judgment against the State, if the court is powerless to execute the judgment? That question was anticipated by Mr. Hamilton in the discussion of the Constitution of the United States before its final adoption. 'To what purpose,' he asked, 'would it be to authorize suits against sovereign States for the debts they owe? How could recoveries be enforced? It is evident that it could not be done without waging war against the contracting State.' Federalist, No. 81. He never dreamed that authorizing suit against a State would imply the right to issue fieri facias on the judgment.

"Puffendorff says: 'And if the prince gives the subject leave to enter an action against him in his own courts, the action itself proceeds rather upon natural equity than on municipal laws. For the end of the action is not to compel the prince to observe the contract, but to persuade him.'

"In England claims against the Crown might be prosecuted before certain courts, in the form of petitions of right, with the consent of the King, but it was held by Lord Mansfield that 'if there were a recovery against the Crown, application must be made to Parliament, and it would come under the head of supplies for the year.' "

Macbeth vs. Haldimand, 1 Durn. & East., 172.

We have examined all the authorities quoted by counsel, and find none of them to support his contention. We are quite certain that no precedent exists sustaining the issuance of a fieri facias on a judgment against a sovereign State in her own courts, though rendered with her own consent.

The only recourse for satisfaction is by application to the Legislature, with whom the judgment should surely have great persuasive force, but none compulsive.

In United States vs. North Carolina, 136 U. S., p. 211, supra, this court took jurisdiction of a suit brought by the United States against that State for money due upon bonds held by the United States.

In United States vs. Michigan, 190 U. S., pp. 377-406, already referred to, this court again took jurisdiction of a suit against Michigan for the recovery of money. At the conclusion of its opinion, at page 406, this court unanimously decided that—

> "There must be a judgment overruling the demurrer, but as the defendant may desire to set up facts which it might claim would be a defense to the complainant's bill, we grant leave to the defendant to answer up to the first day of the next term of this court. In case it refuses to plead further, the judgment will be in favor of the United States for an accounting, and for the payment of the sum found due thereon."

Every writ, process, and remedy which would be available for the enforcement of such a judgment, or for the decree prayed for by the plaintiff in United States vs. North Carolina, 136 U. S., p. 211, supra, would be available for the enforcement of a decree in this case adjudicating the amount of West Virginia's equitable contributive share of the ante-bellum debt of Virginia.

If such decree in United States vs. North Carolina, or the judgment directed in United States vs. Michigan, could not be summarily or effectively enforced, then it may be that a final decree in this case cannot be so enforced.

But it is equally true, and it is a truth which should conclusively dispose of this ground relied upon in the demurrer, that if the inability of this court to award any execution or frame any writ which would enable the United States to enforce any such decree or judgment against North Carolina or against Michigan did not defeat the jurisdiction of this court in the suits against those States, a similar inability to summarily enforce a decree in this case against West Virginia by execution, levy and sale cannot defeat the jurisdiction of this court in this suit against that State for a settlement, ascertainment, and adjudication of the state of the accounts between the two States.

It is impossible by any conceivable process of right reasoning to apply any principle to the case at bar which would defeat the jurisdiction of this court, upon the ground here discussed, which would not have deprived this court of its jurisdiction in each of the cases just considered.

And so upon this alleged ground of demurrer we conclude that the bill presents a controversy between the plaintiff and defendant States justiciable and solvable in this court, and that the jurisdiction of the court will not be defeated because it may be that the plaintiff may not be able to collect from the defendant, or this court may be unable to compel the defendant to actually pay such sum as the court may adjudge and decree to be due by the defendant.

(3.)

To the third ground assigned in defendant's demurrer, namely,

> "That it appears by said bill that the plaintiff herein sues as trustee for the benefit of a number of individuals who are the alleged owners of certain certificates in the said bill set forth and described," our reply is that this assignment is founded upon mistake. It is not true that Virginia sues as trustee for the individuals mentioned or for any other persons. She sues in her own name and for her own benefit, in vindication of her own rights and for her own protection.

It is true that if the relief which she seeks is accorded her it will not only enure to her benefit, but necessarily to the benefit of all of the creditors of the undivided State, as well those who have deposited their unsatisfied bonds in her keeping as those who have never funded the bonds of the original State held by them; as well also those whose bonds and certificates are represented by the "depositing committee," who made the contract which is copied in the bill, as those whose bonds and certificates have not been so deposited. It is true that the amount of the unfunded bonds and of said certificates which are not represented by said "depositing committee" is comparatively small, but they aggregate over a million dollars. Whether their holdings are large or small, this suit must necessarily enure to their benefit, as it must also to the benefit of all of the unsatisfied creditors of Virginia, for the reason that Virginia cannot obtain the exoneration to which she is entitled unless West Virginia's equitable share of liability upon every bond and obligation of the undivided State shall be ascertained and adjudicated.

Indeed, a little reflection will show it to be true, that the amount and extent of West Virginia's liability in respect to any one of the original bonds representing Virginia's ante-bellum debt could not be ascertained without at the same time by the same token ascertaining her aliquot liability as to all of the others of those bonds.

It will be seen at once that this is true, for under the Wheeling ordinance and the first constitution of West Virginia, framed and adopted in pursuance and effectuation of that ordinance, and under the contract thereby created between Virginia and West Virginia, it would be impossible to determine what part of any particular bond West Virginia is legally and equitably bound to pay without first ascertaining what is the equitable proportion of the entire ante-bellum indebtedness of the undivided State.

And so no suit could be brought by Virginia against West Virginia; and, indeed, if an individual could legally institute and prosecute such a suit, no suit could be brought by any individual holder of a single one or any larger number of the bonds of the original State against West Virginia for a settlement and be prosecuted to a finality without an ascertainment of West Virginia's share of the entire indebtedness.

But Virginia's status in reference to this suit and her relation to the bonds deposited with her and the relief she seeks, and to which the bill shows her to be entitled in respect to those bonds and to the whole case, have been already fully discussed in the foregoing part of this brief and they need not be further treated here.

It is true that in the prayer for general relief Virginia asks that—

> "all proper accounts be taken to determine and ascertain the balance due from the State of West Virginia to your oratrix in her own right and as trustee as aforesaid."

But this, we submit, does not convert the suit which she has brought in her own name and right into a suit by her as trustee; for, in the settlement of the accounts which this court may hereafter direct to be taken between Virginia and West Virginia it will be convenient, if not necessary, in the ascertainment of West Virginia's contributive proportion of the original public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia to show the amounts due to Virginia in her own right and also as trustee. Indeed, the prayer of the bill for the ascertainment of the amount due by West Virginia upon the bonds held by Virginia as trustee might be omitted without impairing the character and effect of the bill.

The paramount and controlling equity which Virginia asserts and relies on, is her right to have a settlement and accounting between West Virginia and herself of all the matters growing out of the partition of her territory and the adjustment and determination of the respective rights and liabilities of the two States. This, we submit, is Virginia's right, and it is not affected by any questions that may be suggested as to the disposition she may make of whatever amount may be decreed by this court to be due to her.

It may be true that she has pledged in advance the full amount of any such recovery to the payment ratably of certain of her old debts, or even that she has made a declaration of trust as to such amount in favor of those creditors; but those are matters which cannot be considered on this demurrer. They are in nowise involved in the ground of equitable jurisdiction invoked by this bill. Virginia's right to compel contributions from West Virginia to the satisfaction of a common liability cannot be impaired or at all affected by the fact that Virginia has declared her purpose to apply the amount recovered to the payment of her debts.

They are matters which may, and doubtless will, be laid before the master to whom the settlement and statement of the account is intrusted, or they may have to be considered and passed on by this court, in the directions it may give to the master for his guidance in the execution of the order of reference; but they form no proper subject for consideration or action by the court at this stage of the case. The only question presented for decision now is, Has Virginia shown by her bill a proper case for the relief asked, of an accounting and for contribution from West Virginia?

The fourth assignment of grounds of demurrer is so general in its terms that it is difficult to make to it a specific reply. It is as follows:

> "That the said bill does not state facts sufficient to entitle the Commonwealth of Virginia to the relief prayed for, or to any relief, either in her own right or as trustee for the owners of the certificates therein set forth and described."

This contention rests largely upon the same grounds upon which the second assignment is based, and the reply to it is very much the same, which is a conclusive answer to that assignment, and the importance of the case will justify some iteration in stating this reply.

The case stated in the bill must on this demurrer be taken to be true as to the facts charged. Among the facts charged are the following, viz:

1. That the restored State of Virginia, in convention assembled, did, on the 20th day of August, 1861, adopt an ordinance:

> "To provide for the formation of a new State out of the portion of the territory of this State."

That section 9 of that ordinance was as follows, viz:

> "9. The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, &c., as above quoted."

2. That on the 31st of December, 1862, the Congress of the United States, by act, provided that the new State, thus formed in pursuance of said ordinance, should be admitted into the Union by the name of West Virginia.

3. That on the 20th of June, 1863, the State of West Virginia was accordingly admitted.

4. That by act of the General Assembly of the restored State of Virginia, passed February 3, 1863, all property—real, personal, and mixed—owned by Virginia, but situated within the proposed boundaries of West Virginia, was granted and transferred to West Virginia upon the condition, viz, that—> "The State of West Virginia shall duly account for the same in the settlement hereafter to be made with this State," &c.

5. That under and by virtue of said act there was actually received and enjoyed by the State of West Virginia property of the Commonwealth of Virginia amounting in value to several millions of dollars.

6. That by act of the General Assembly of the restored State of Virginia, passed February 4, 1863, there was appropriated to the State of West Virginia from the public moneys of Virginia the sum of $150,000; and there was further appropriated "all moneys not otherwise appropriated then" and that may come into the treasury up to the time when the State of West Virginia shall become one of the United States.

7. That by section 8 of article 8 of the constitution framed and adopted by the State of West Virginia, and under and in accordance with and by reason of which she was admitted into the Union of States, it was provided:

> "8. An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable—and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

8. That the legislature of West Virginia never ascertained the amount of West Virginia's "equitable proportion" of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861; that the State of West Virginia has never accounted for the property of the Commonwealth of Virginia which was turned over to and received by her, amounting in value to several millions of dollars; that the State of West Virginia has failed and refused through a period of forty years, and in the face of repeated solicitations on the part of Virginia, to enter upon any settlement of the accounts between herself and Virginia, but has oftentimes and but recently, through one or the other of the two houses of her legislature, declared that she would not recognize any liability whatever as resting upon her to the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Wherefore, and by reason of the matters of fact aptly charged in the bill, it is manifest that a controversy is presented between the Commonwealth of Virginia and the State of West Virginia to which the judicial power of the United States extends and as to which this court has original jurisdiction.

West Virginia obtained the consent of the restored State of Virginia to the erection upon the territory of Virginia of this new State, and she procured the aid of the Senators and Representatives of Virginia in Congress in having her invested with sovereignty and admitted into the Union upon the express terms of the "Wheeling ordinance," which bound her to "take upon herself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia."

West Virginia obtained admission into the Union of States on an express undertaking in her constitution that—

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State."

West Virginia received and applied to her own uses property belonging to the Commonwealth of Virginia to the amount in value of several millions of dollars, on the express condition that she would "duly account for the same in the settlement hereafter to be made with this State."

Hence it is evident that the "demand" referred to in this branch of the first ground of demurrer is not, as there assumed, "a simple demand for money," but it is a prayer that the accounting, so solemnly promised, may now be had, under the direction of this court.

The bill presents a state of facts from which it appears that the case is one for the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction of account upon some of the most important grounds upon which that jurisdiction can be invoked, according to the authorities and precedents.

(a) There have been in the first place complicated transactions running back to the creation of this new State, and back of that for about thirty years, embracing numerous loans made by the original State of Virginia and a large number of expenditures of the money thus borrowed in the construction of internal improvements outside and inside the territory now constituting West Virginia.

Any such settlement would necessitate, first, an ascertainment of the amount of the public debt of Virginia as of January 1, 1861, a matter which in itself would require the services of a skillful and painstaking accountant.

There would also have to be an ascertainment of a great multitude of items of expenditure made by the old State within the limits of what is now West Virginia, and of a vast number of payments made in the shape of taxes by the people living in that territory towards the support of the State government, in each case, from the date of the inception of the State debt down to the 1st of January, 1861.

There would have to be, moreover, a determination of what was the proportion of the general expenses of the State government equitably chargeable against the counties and cities now constituting West Virginia during the same period. All of this, and more than is indicated here, would have to be ascertained in order to furnish the data upon which to ascertain the just proportion of the debt of the Commonwealth which West Virginia can be required or expected to pay upon the basis prescribed in the Wheeling ordinance.

These complicated statements, and the accounting necessary to evolve from them accurately, fairly, and justly the share of the common indebtedness which can be equitably assigned to West Virginia, alone would furnish an amply sufficient justification for a resort to a court of equity for an account.

But, in addition to this ground, there are others which even more emphatically call for the equitable relief to which the bill shows the plaintiff to be entitled.

(a) Prominent among these is the plaintiff's right to contribution. The basis of this right has been already fully stated in this brief, and in the bill. (See paragraph XVI, p. 16 of the bill.)

As to the right to invoke the aid of a court of equity to establish the right to contribution, see Wills vs. Hubbell's Adm'r, 2 Johns. Chy. R., 401.

(b) Another ground for equitable jurisdiction recognized by all of the authorities upon equitable jurisprudence and practice is the plaintiff's right to exoneration upon the facts stated in the bill and already fully stated in the former part of this brief.

(c) Another ground for equitable relief shown by the bill is the accounting necessary to ascertain what money and property, stocks, and other assets of Virginia were transferred to and received by West Virginia under the acts of the General Assembly of Virginia of February 3 and 4, 1863. (See pp. 4, 5, and 6, paragraphs VIII and IX of the bill.)

(d) Another ground for the exercise of equitable jurisdiction shown by the bill is the avoidance of a multiplicity of suits. Virginia sustains, as appears from the bill, various associated relations in respect to West Virginia, all affecting the property and pecuniary rights of the two States, all growing out of the formation of the new State, closely related to the partition of the territory and property and the apportionment of the common indebtedness of the undivided

State, and all necessarily factors to be considered in making any satisfactory or final settlement between the two States.

First. Virginia holds obligations and evidences of indebtedness of the undivided State great in number and large in aggregate amount, paid off or retired by her, doubtless, at different times and under variant circumstances, but each of them giving her a claim against West Virginia to be reimbursed to the extent of West Virginia's liability therefor.

Second. She is entitled to have West Virginia make proper remuneration to her or give her proper credit for the money and property of Virginia which West Virginia received under the acts of February 3 and 4, 1863.

Third. She is entitled to exoneration to the extent of West Virginia's equitable liability upon the various transaction set forth in the bill, hereinbefore fully stated.

It is not only proper, but it is alike West Virginia's and Virginia's right and to their interest, to have the settlement of all of these associated claims and transactions made in one suit, instead of the parties being harassed by a number of suits for the equitable adjustment of matters which can be far more satisfactorily, intelligently, and fairly considered and adjudicated in one suit.

(5.)

The fifth ground assigned in the amended demurrer—

> "That it does not appear by said bill that the Attorney-General has ever been authorized to institute and prosecute this suit in the name of the Commonwealth of Virginia in her own right, but only as trustee for the use and benefit of the owners of certain certificates mentioned in the act of March 6, > 1900, which is referred to and made part of said bill," is refuted by the bill. In support of this statement it is only necessary to refer to the following parts of the bill.

The act of the General Assembly of Virginia approved March 6, 1900, printed at pages 41-42 of the bill, entitled

> "An act to provide for the settlement with West Virginia of the proportion of the public debt of the original State of Virginia proper to be borne by West Virginia, and for the due protection of the Commonwealth in the premises," in the second section thereof authorized the Virginia Debt Commission, appointed under the joint resolution of March 6, 1894, upon certain conditions mentioned in that section,

> "by and with the advice and approval of the Attorney-General of Virginia to take such action and institute such proceedings on behalf of the State as may in the judgment of the commission and the Attorney-General be needful and proper to protect the interest of the State, and bring about and carry into effect a settlement as aforesaid."

The bill avers (paragraph XX, p. 11) that—

> "This suit has been instituted at the request and direction of said commission, and in strict conformity with the provisions of said act of March 6, 1900."

The exhibits filed with and as part of the bill, and particularly the report made by said commission to the General Assembly of Virginia on the 9th of January, 1906, Exhibit No. 8, pages 43-50 of the bill, prove the truth of this allegation, though its truth, of course, cannot be questioned by the demurrant.

The sixth ground of demurrer assigned in the amended demurrer is:

> "That the said bill does not sufficiently and definitely set forth the claims and demands relied upon, but the allegations thereof are so indefinitely (sic) and uncertain that no proper answer can be made thereto."

The bill, with as much exactness and particularity as is possible under the circumstances, sets forth with much detail the facts upon which the plaintiff claims to be entitled to relief.

It is as full and precise in asserting the demands which it asserts against the defendant as it is reasonably practicable to make those allegations without first having had the accounting with the defendant which is the primary relief for which the bill prays.

If Virginia could, without such an accounting with West Virginia, state with definiteness just what is the sum West Virginia should pay to Virginia, an action of assumpsit might have sufficed; but no remedy at law could give her the relief to which she is entitled by way of exoneration, nor is there any adequate remedy at law by which the complicated and more or less intricate accounts can be so digested and stated upon equitable principles as to reach a result which will be just to the parties.

(7.)

The seventh assignment made by defendant's amended demurrer is:

> "That the allegations in the said bill are not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff therein, either in her own right or as trustee, to an account or to a discovery from this defendant."

This has been already answered in the answers made to other alleged objections to the bill. The plaintiff's right to an account is unquestionable upon any one of the several grounds already discussed; and a plaintiff is entitled to discovery in any case in which any right to equitable relief exists, and the defendant is in possession of any information, documents, or records which may throw any light upon the questions at issue or facilitate a just solution of those questions.

(8.)

The eighth and last ground of demurrer assigned is:

> "That the said bill does not contain any prayer for a judgment or decree or any other final relief against this defendant."

This objection is possibly even more technical than some of the others presented in the demurrers.

It was not necessary under the English chancery practice, adopted by this court in 1792 for the guidance and direction of suitors and practitioners therein, to have any prayer at all for special relief.

Under the prayer for general relief the plaintiff could obtain all such relief as he was found by the chancellor to be entitled to upon the state of facts alleged in his bill and established by his proofs.

> "The old bills in chancery did not contain any special statement of relief, but only what is called the prayer for general relief." * * *
>
> Adams' Eq., m. p. 309.
>
> Mitford's Pleading, m. p. 39.
>
> Cook vs. Martin, 2 Atk., p. 141.

Under later practice in England, the prayer for general relief was still held to be sufficient, though it became the uniform practice to insert a special prayer, and to conclude with the prayer for general relief.

Adams' Eq., m. p. 309.

But there are prayers in the bill for special relief, namely,

> "that the said State of West Virginia may be made a party defendant to this bill, and required to answer the same, that all proper accounts may be taken to determine and ascertain the balance due from the State of West Virginia to your oratrix, in her own right and as trustee as aforesaid; that the principles upon which such accounting shall be had may be ascertained and declared, and a true and proper settlement made of the matters and things above recited and set forth; that such accounting be had and settlement made under the supervision and direction of this court by such auditor or master as may by the court be selected and empowered to that end, and that proper and full reports of such accounting and settlement may be made to this court; that the State of West Virginia may be required to produce before such auditor or master, so to be appointed, all such official entries, documents, reports and proceedings as may be among her public records or official files and may tend to show the facts and the true and actual state of accounts growing out of the matters and things above recited and set forth, in order to a full and correct settlement and adjustment of the accounts between the two States; that this court will adjudicate and determine the amount due to your oratrix by the State of West Virginia in the premises;'

These prayers not only ask for the specific relief stated, but that "the court will adjudicate and determine the amount due to your oratrix by the State of West Virginia."

An adjudication is a solemn judgment of a court. The word "adjudicate" is defined to mean:

> "To determine in the exercise of judicial power; to pronounce judgment in a case" (Anderson's Dict. of Law).
>
> "Synonymous with adjudge in its strictest sense" (Abbott's L. Dict.).
>
> "To determine judicially; try and decide; adjudge" (Standard Dictionary).

So a prayer for an adjudication by the court is a prayer for a judgment.

But such a prayer is unnecessary in a bill invoking the chancery jurisdiction of account.

The judgment or decree upon the account when taken and confirmed by the court is a necessary incident to the relief sought:

> "for it is implied if not expressed in the decree to account that the balance shall be paid to the party entitled."
>
> 1 Madd Chy. Pr.; title, Account, p. 86.

But where there is a prayer for special relief which does not adequately define or even inaccurately state the relief to which the plaintiff is shown upon the case presented to be equitably entitled, such relief as is adequate and appropriate to the case can and should be granted by the court.

1 Daniell's Chy. Pr., ed. 1846, p. 434.

The modern English practice is > "to pray particular relief, though if the particular relief prayed for in the bill cannot be given exactly as prayed, the court will assist the particular prayer under the general prayer; but relief inconsistent with the specific relief prayed, cannot be given under the general prayer."

>
> 2 Madd Chy., m. p. 172.
> Beaumont vs. Beaumont, 5 Ves., p. 495.
> Muckleston and Brown, 6 Ves., p. 52.

The proposition asserted in this eighth assignment is negatived by repeated decisions of this court.

It will be noted that the bill contains prayers for special relief and also a prayer for "all such other, further and general relief as the nature of the case may require and to equity may seem meet."

In English vs. Foxhall, 2 Peters, p. 612, this court declared that—

> "There is no doubt but that, under the general prayer, other relief may be granted than that which is particularly prayed. But such relief must be agreeable to the case made by the bill."

And in Watts and others vs. Waddle and others, 6 Peters, pp. 389-403, this court said:

> "Although there is no specific prayer in the bill to be paid the rents and profits, yet the court think that under the general prayer this relief can be granted. Under this prayer any relief may be given for which the basis is laid in the bill."

And in Walden, &c., vs. Boley and others, 14 Peters, pp. 164-5, this court decided that—

> "A court of equity cannot act upon a case which is not fairly made by the bill and answer. But it is not necessary that these should point out in detail the means which the court shall adopt in giving relief. Under the general prayer of relief, the court will often extend relief beyond the specific prayer, and not exactly in accordance with it."

In the case cited this court decided that—

> "There is nothing in the intricacy of equity pleading that prevents the plaintiff from obtaining the relief under the general prayer, to which he may be entitled upon the facts plainly stated in the bill. There is no reason for denying his right to relief, if > the plaintiff is otherwise entitled to it, simply because it is asked under the prayer for general relief, and upon a somewhat different theory from that which is advanced under one of the special prayers."

These authorities would seem to unquestionably establish the sufficiency of the prayers for relief in the bill, and to effectively dispose of the eighth ground of objection laid in the amended demurrer.

The grounds of objection to the bill alleged in the original demurrer have not been noticed, for the reason that they are all merged in or covered by the amended demurrer.

Upon the whole case presented, it is respectfully submitted that the demurrers should be overruled, and the defendant required to answer the plaintiff's bill.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

OCTOBER TERM, 1906.

Original, No. 7.

vs.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

REPLY BRIEF OF COUNSEL FOR VIRGINIA UPON THE DEMURRERS TO THE BILL.

I.

The bill is not demurrable on the ground of multifariousness, either because of uniting any two or more distinct and separate matters or grounds for equitable jurisdiction, or upon the alleged ground that it blends in the same bill two causes of action, one of which is of equitable and the other of legal cognizance.

(1) None of the grounds for equitable relief shown by the bill are distinct and separate and independent of the other grounds assigned in the bill for the relief prayed. All of the demands for relief shown by the bill are intimately connected with each other and are properly to be considered in stating any account and making any settlement between the two States.

It cannot be fairly contended that any item of charge against West Virginia suggested by the bill is not a proper item to be brought into any statement which shall fairly ascertain the true state of accounts between the parties and the amount which the plaintiff is equitably entitled to recover from the defendant.

It is manifest that the equity for contribution and the equity for exoneration, to which the bill plainly shows that the plaintiff is entitled, are, for the purposes and with reference to all the legitimate objects of this suit, so associated together and so connected with each other that it would be impossible for the court to give complete relief, and to ascertain the amount for which the plaintiff has a just claim against West Virginia without bringing all of these matters into the account.

It would be impossible fairly and justly to state the account between these parties without bringing into it the sums with which West Virginia is justly chargeable on account of the moneys and property constituting integral parts of the assets of the undivided State which West Virginia has received under the acts of the restored government of Virginia passed in 1863.

(2) But if, applying rigidly an extreme technical rule of pleading, it could be claimed that the demand which Virginia has a right, as shown by paragraph VIII of her bill, to make of the defendant imports a legal cause of action, and could not for any reason be properly cognizable by a court of chancery in making a final settlement between the parties to this cause, then, according to the rule of common sense and common justice, well settled by the authorities, the averment of such a cause of action in the bill will not be fatal to the maintenance of the suit, but will be treated as surplusage by a court of equity, and either ignored in its consideration of the case or will be by amendment stricken from the bill without prejudice.

We are saved any necessity for any further discussion of this phase of the argument of defendant's counsel by the admirable statement of the law governing this subject, accurately expressed in the work upon "Equity Procedure" of which the learned counsel, Mr. Charles E. Hogg, who opened the oral argument for West Virginia and is upon her brief, is the author.

The principles governing this subject, as stated in Hogg's Equity Procedure, edition of 1903, vol. 1, sec. 136, furnish a conclusive answer to the elaborate argument of the counsel for the defendant upon this branch of the case and are as follows:

> "SEC. 136. Courts of equity have declined to announce a general rule applicable to all cases of multifariousness, being guided by considerations of convenience in each particular case rather than by any absolute rule. But there are certain cardinal principles which have been established by repeated and numberless decisions in the court of equity, and if borne in mind it will seldom if ever be found difficult to determine whether multifariousness exists in the particular case.
>
> "As to what these particulars are, all the adjudged cases agree.
>
> "From the numerous decisions relating to this matter, a few of which are cited in the foot-notes, the following principles may be safely declared to govern in questions of this character:
>
> "1. A bill will always be deemed multifarious where several matters joined in the bill against one defendant are so entirely distinct and independent of each other that the defendant will be compelled to unite in his answer and defense different matters wholly unconnected with each other, and as a consequence the proofs applicable to each would be apt to be confounded with each other, and great delay might be occasioned respecting matters ripe for hearing by waiting for proofs as to some other matters ready for hearing.

"2. It will be treated as multifarious where there is a demand of several matters of a wholly distinct and independent nature, in the same bill, rendering the proceedings oppressive because it would tend to load each defendant with an unnecessary burden of costs by swelling the pleadings with the statement of the several claims of the other defendant or defendants with which he has no connection.

"3. A bill against two or more defendants will be regarded as multifarious which also embodies a separate and distinct claim against one of the defendants only.

"4. A bill will not usually be regarded as multifarious when the matters joined in the bill, though distinct, are not absolutely independent of each other, and it will be more convenient to dispose of them in one suit.

"5. A blending of two causes of action in the same bill, one of which is of equitable cognizance and the other legal, will not render a bill multifarious, as the latter will be treated as mere surplusage and stricken from the bill and the cause retained as to the equitable ground of the suit." (Italics, here and elsewhere, ours.)

These propositions are amply supported by the authorities cited by the learned author and by the following:

II.

The next ground of objection to the bill urged by defendant's counsel, which I will notice, is that the plaintiff has, as they allege, no interest in the subject-matter of the controversy and asks no substantive relief for herself.

This position of opposing counsel is based upon an extraordinary misapprehension of the bill.

(a) The bill shows that the plaintiff has a very large direct claim against the defendant because of the fact that the plaintiff has paid off and satisfied in full obligations and evidences of indebtedness of the undivided State, including interest from the dates of payment of the several items constituting said demand, considerably in excess of $25,000,000, and that for this Virginia has a just claim against West Virginia for contribution to the extent of West Virginia's equitable liability therefor.

See paragraph XVI, page 9 of the bill.

(b) The bill shows that it is not true in fact, as counsel argued, that Virginia has been released in respect to the unfunded portion of the bonds of the original State deposited with her under the act of 1871 and amounting, as appears from the exhibits printed at pages 73 and 90 of the bill, to $12,703,451.79, with interest on the principal sum thereof from July 1, 1871. As to this portion of the old debt of the State, Virginia has never been released, and her own highest court, in Greenhow vs. Vashon, 81 Va., 342-343, has so declared. In that case Judge Richardson, delivering the opinion of the court, quoting with approval the dictum of Judge Staples in Antoni vs. Wright, 22 Gratt., 864-5, says:

> "It is said that the creditor has released one-third of his debt. I do not so understand it, and I will hazard the assertion the creditor does not so construe the law. If this was the intention of the framers > of the act they have adopted an obscure and equivocal mode of expressing a plain and simple agreement. The creditor surrenders his bond and obtains a new one for two-thirds of his debt, and coupons for the interest. For the remaining one-third the bond is held in trust by the State, and a certificate is given him stating that payment will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as may be made with West Virginia. If that State is faithful to the obligations resting upon her the creditor will receive the other two-thirds also. On the other hand, if she repudiates these obligations there is no agreement or understanding absolving the State from the payment of such third. It is as much bound for the payment of the whole debt as before the passage of the funding bill."

And the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, in Higginbotham vs. The Commonwealth, 25 Gratt., 627, expressed substantially the same opinion. This ought to be conclusive of this particular question for the purposes of this demurrer.

But, independently of said decisions, we assert with absolute confidence in the unquestionable correctness of the proposition, that it is impossible to read the act of March 30, 1871, and particularly section 3 of said act, found at pages 14 and 15 of the bill, without seeing not only that Virginia is not released, but that she has solemnly contracted that payment of said unfunded one-third, with the interest due thereon, "will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall hereafter be had between the States of Virginia and West Virginia in regard to the public debt of the State of Virginia existing at the time of its dismemberment."

* * * * * * *

The manifest effect of the transaction was to continue in full force the liability upon the unfunded third of each of the bonds so deposited, both as against Virginia and against West Virginia, the only concession that the creditor made being that payment could not be expected or required of Virginia until a settlement should be had between the two States.

While the creditor, as the result of this arrangement, took the risk of such a settlement ever being made, it was none the less the duty of Virginia to do all that could be reasonably and fairly expected of her to bring about and effect such a settlement; and, her repeated efforts to that end having proved abortive by reason of the failure of West Virginia to meet her overtures, this suit has become necessary.

Her equity to maintain this suit in respect to the $12,700,000 of unfunded bonds deposited with her under the act of 1871 is based upon her right to exoneration to the extent of West Virginia's liability upon the indebtedness represented by those bonds.

By reason of the contract which her creditors have made with her, she has a further interest in maintaining this suit, viz., to obtain COMPLETE exoneration in respect to those unfunded bonds as to which she has been in no sense released, but can only be released by an adjudication of this court against West Virginia ascertaining West Virginia's aliquot liability on account of the said indebtedness.

(c) Nor is it true in any sense that Virginia has in any degree impaired her right to maintain this suit because she has agreed to turn over to her creditors entitled thereto the ratable proportion of any amount which she may obtain from West Virginia assignable to the holders of the unsatisfied obligations of the undivided State.

It cannot in any court of conscience impair a plaintiff's right to equity because her bill shows that it is her purpose to do equity.

Any recovery from West Virginia will, by the terms of Virginia's contract with the representatives of the creditors of the undivided State be ratably apportioned among all of the holders of the ante-bellum obligations of the original State, including Virginia as now constituted. The creditors other than Virginia will receive their pro rata share of such recovery in entire exoneration of Virginia, and Virginia will receive or retain the pro rata share of such recovery assignable to the obligations and evidences of indebtedness of the original State which she has paid in full, by way of equitable contribution to her.

It will be apparent from an examination of the contract between Virginia and the committee representing the certificates which she has issued, and which in turn represent the unsatisfied obligations of the undivided State, that, while the arrangements which Virginia has made with the common creditors or their representatives for her protection, and for their protection, with a view to their payment, and to her payment, and to her exoneration, enure alike to her benefit and to the benefit of the common creditors, West Virginia is not in the slightest degree prejudiced, nor are her interests or rights to any extent impaired by reason of any of these arrangements.

There were different stipulations in the certificates issued under the act of 1879, 1882, and 1892, in reference to the settlement of the public debt of Virginia, but they do not impair Virginia's right to maintain this suit.

III.

With strange persistency counsel for West Virginia insist that jurisdiction has not been conferred upon this court by the judiciary clauses of the Federal Constitution over controversies between two or more States involving directly or indirectly a demand for the payment of money.

Their contention is that—

Jurisdiction imports power not only to decide, but to grant adequate relief, and—

That this court is powerless to give adequate relief to the plaintiff upon the case stated by her, and—

That therefore this court can have no jurisdiction of this cause.

We have shown in our brief, already filed, for the plaintiff that this question has been repeatedly adjudicated in this court, against defendant's contention, in cases so analogous to the case at bar that it is impossible to distinguish them upon any ground of principle as to this particular question.

But we have a further sufficient reply to make to this contention.

The proposition of opposing counsel rests upon the assumption that this court cannot give adequate relief.

That is not true. The court can give all the relief that is in the nature of things appropriate to the case and all that is prayed for by the bill.

It can cause the account between the two States to be stated and an ascertainment and an adjudication of the equitable proportion of the public ante-bellum debt of Virginia to be borne by West Virginia to be had, and upon confirming the report made by its master in chancery can, and will, adjudge and decree the amount which West Virginia is equitably bound to pay on account of the common indebtedness of the original State.

This, as is shown by the bill and pointed out in our former brief, not only will give Virginia adequate, but will accord her complete, relief, because it will operate to exonerate her from any further liability on account of that indebtedness to the extent already plainly shown.

In further reply to this branch of argument of defendant's counsel, I beg leave to add to what has already been said upon that subject, that it has never been held by this court that no execution or process could under any circumstances be issued upon any judgment against a State upon any pecuniary demand.

Whether strictly private property of West Virginia, property owned for profit and charged with no public trusts or uses, property owned for some commercial purpose, or owned just as an individual might own such property, would be liable to levy, attachment, or sale under an execution issued under a decree of this court, is a question which we hope will never arise and can never arise unless West Virginia shall fail or refuse to respect a decree of this court and to comply with its terms.

It will be time enough then for this court to decide what further action, if any, shall be taken in enforcement of its decree.

We frankly say that we at present know of no property of defendant which would be liable to levy or sale under any execution issued by this court, but it is not very difficult to conceive of a condition of things in which West Virginia might own property within the jurisdiction of this court which would be liable to be subjected for the satisfaction of a decree in this case. I fully concede that only such property as was not held by that State for governmental purposes and not charged with any public trust could be subjected for the satisfaction of a decree of this court; but there may be circumstances under which property charged with a special trust for the satisfaction of the very debt claimed here, or property not charged with any public trust, belonging to the State of West Virginia and held by her, just as a private individual might hold such property, might be liable to be attached for the satisfaction of a decree of this court in this cause.

Tried by the same principles which have controlled this court and the State courts in respect to judgments entered against municipal corporations, there can be no question that the fact that an effective execution cannot be issued upon the judgment does not invalidate the judgment.

The execution is in no sense and under no circumstances an essential part of the judgment.

Whether a defendant has or has not any property on which a lawful execution could be validly levied does not at all affect the validity, though it may affect the value, of a judgment against him.

III.

I come now to consider the ground upon which Mr. Carlisle, the distinguished counsel for West Virginia who closed the oral argument of the case, seems in his brief and in his oral argument to mainly rely in his advocacy of the demurrers, though it is a ground not mentioned or suggested in either of the demurrers.

His contention is that by reason of the provisions of the alleged act of the General Assembly of Virginia, passed May 13, 1862, which were as follows:

> "That the consent of the legislature of Virginia be, and the same is hereby given to the formation and erection of the State of West Virginia, according to the boundaries and along the provisions set forth in the constitution for the said State of West Virginia, and the schedule thereto annexed proposed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling, on the twenty-sixth day of November, eighteen hundred and sixty-one."

and of the provisions of section 8 of article VIII of the constitution of West Virginia, which is in the following words:

> "8. An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable and provide for the liquida> tion thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

a compact was created by which the legislature of West Virginia was constituted the sole tribunal to ascertain, adjudicate, and finally decide what was the equitable proportion of the public debt of the undivided State which West Virginia should assume and pay.

Upon this extraordinary contention counsel for the defendant seem now mainly to rest their case.

(a) We deny that the fact of such an alleged compact, not mentioned or suggested in the bill, can be relied on as ground of demurrer.

(b) We challenge the averment that any such act as the alleged act of May 13, 1862, was ever passed by any legislature of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and we crave oyer of the act, if it is to be relied on.

(c) If the meaning and effect contended for by the counsel for the defendant could be fairly given to the terms of section 1 of the said alleged act of May 13, 1862, then Virginia has a right to insist, and does insist, that said act shall be at least reasonably, if not strictly, construed.

Under no fair construction of that act can it possibly have any such legal effect, even upon the violent hypothesis of counsel for the defendant, for the reason that the alleged consent and agreement of the Commonwealth of Virginia, as therein expressed, was predicated upon the admission of West Virginia into the Union under the provisions of the constitution for the State of West Virginia, and the schedule thereto annexed, proposed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the twenty-sixth day of November, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, while the fact is that West Virginia never was admitted into the Union under that constitution, but was admitted under an amended constitution submitted to the people of West Virginia by an ordinance adopted by a convention thereof on the sixteenth of February, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, and pursuant to a further ordinance adopted by the said convention, entitled "An ordinance to provide for the organization of the State of West Virginia," passed February nineteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, as will appear from the said constitution and ordinances of the State of West Virginia, published in the volume entitled "Constitution and Statutes of Virginia and West Virginia," printed pursuant to the act of the legislature of West Virginia passed February, twenty-sixth, eighteen hundred and sixty-six.

Non constat but that the consent of the legislature of Virginia would never have been given in manner and form as expressed in the alleged act of February thirteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, if predicated upon the amended constitution, which was subsequently submitted to the people of West Virginia and received their sanction at the polls. This is by no means so strained a construction as that which counsel for the defendant would feign give to this act.

(d) But we deny utterly that by any fair or reasonable construction of the language of the first section of said act of May thirteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, taken in connection with the provisions of the constitution proposed for the State of West Virginia by the convention which met in the city of Wheeling on the 26th of November, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, the language of that section was ever by any possibility intended by the legislature of Virginia or understood by the convention or by the people of West Virginia, or by any rational human being, to be, or to operate as, a SUBMISSION to the legislature of West Virginia of the question of the amount and proportion of the common debt of the original State which it was equitable and just for West Virginia to assume and pay; or that that enactment was ever intended by Virginia, or understood by West Virginia, or by any one, to bind Virginia to accept and abide by such determination of that matter as might be made by the legislature of West Virginia, however capricious or unjust its judgment might be; or was ever intended or understood by either of the parties, or by anybody, to constitute the legislature of one of the parties to the present controversy a tribunal with plenary power and exclusive jurisdiction to determine and decide anything in respect to the common ante-bellum debt of Virginia which would be binding upon Virginia; and yet such is the contention of the learned counsel, unless we misapprehend the language of their briefs.

All that could be reasonably inferred from the language used in said act of May thirteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, taken in connection with the proposed constitution of West Virgina, was that Virginia gave her consent to the creation of the State of West Virginia out of her territory under that constitution and that section 8 of article VIII of the proposed constitution was designed not to create any new contractual relation or obligation between Virginia and West Virginia, but to be, and operate as, a mandate from the people of West Virginia to the legislature of West Virginia, requiring that legislature to assume an equitable proportion of the public debt of the original State, and as soon as practicable to ascertain the same and to provide for its liquidation by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years, and that Virginia was willing that West Virginia should become a State of the Union under a constitution which contained those provisions and the other provisions expressed in the constitution as formulated and proposed prior to May thirteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-two.

Reasonably construed, the purpose and effect of section 8 of article VIII was to place upon the new State an equitable proportion of the public debt of the old State and to require, and make it the duty of, the legislature of the new State to provide for the payment of West Virginia's equitable proportion of that debt, so that the entire amount, interest and principal, should be extinguished and paid off within the period of thirty-four years.

Nearly forty-four years have elapsed, and yet West Virginia has done nothing; has paid not one cent of the interest or the principal of the debt; but, on the contrary, has repudiated every obligation imposed upon her by the stipulations of the Wheeling ordinance which constituted the essential condition of her political existence.

(c) But the entire conception and theory of opposing counsel upon this subject have been demolished by the fact that West Virginia has repealed and abrogated the constitution under which she was admitted into the Union, by the adoption of a new constitution in eighteen hundred and seventy-two, which new constitution contains no provision whatever requiring that State to assume an equitable proportion, or any other proportion, of the ante-bellum debt of Virginia, or requiring the legislature of that State to provide for the payment of any portion of that debt.

See West Virginia Constitution, adopted in 1872; Code of West Virginia, 1887.

By her present constitution West Virginia ignores her obligation to pay any part of the debt, and if it had ever been true that anybody had ever attempted to constitute, or dreamed of constituting, the legislature of that State the supreme and ultimate arbiter between the two States as to the amount of the common debt which West Virginia should bear, West Virginia has not only failed and refused to discharge the duty as arbitrator, but she has actually abdicated any such function, duty, or power by repealing the constitution which counsel claim conferred such exclusive, supreme, and irreviewable jurisdiction upon her legislature.

IV.

The other points discussed in the briefs of defendant's counsel have been already anticipated and sufficiently met by the brief of counsel for Virginia already filed. A singular misapprehension of the language of the bill, and of the exhibits which constitute important parts thereof, has led counsel for the defendant into several errors of fact, two of which I deem it proper to notice. One is their contention that Virginia has ever made it a condition of any settlement or negotiation with West Virginia that that State should assume one-third of the ante-bellum debt of Virginia.

It was a condition of the negotiation and settlement authorized to be made by the resolution adopted by the General Assembly of Virginia on the 6th of March, eighteen hundred and ninety-four (pp. 39-40 of the bill), that Virginia was not to be charged with or assume more than two-thirds of the debt of the original State already assumed and provided for by her as her equitable proportion thereof.

But even under that resolution there was no condition whatever as to what West Virginia was to pay. That was left wide open as a matter for negotiation and adjustment.

And by the act of March sixth, nineteen hundred, pages 41 and 42 of bill, beyond the shadow of a doubt, plenary power was conferred upon that commission, with the approval of the Attorney General, to make any settlement and adjustment with the State of West Virginia which it might be practicable to make, and which the commission and the Attorney General might approve, provided the creditors, as defined in the act, agreed to accept such amount as might be recovered from West Virginia as a full settlement of all their claims against the State of Virginia.

Another inaccuracy of statement by opposing counsel, founded upon a like misapprehension, is that Virginia has submitted any ultimatum to West Virginia, or has made as a condition of an amicable adjustment with West Virginia, or of a negotiation or accounting with West Virginia looking to such amicable adjustment, any condition that West Virginia should assume and undertake to pay any particular proportion of the common debt or any sum whatever; and particularly are the counsel for the defendant in error upon this point as to the last effort made by Virginia to bring about an amicable settlement, as will be seen from an examination of the address of Mr. Randolph Harrison, made on behalf of the Virginia Debt Commission before the joint committees on finance of the West Virginia legislature on the first of February, nineteen hundred and five, and printed on pages 66-80 of the bill.

Among other things of interest to this cause and to the questions now submitted to the court which will be found in that admirable address, Mr. Harrison, on page 76 of the bill, said:

> "We do not ask that West Virginia shall commit herself as liable in any specific amount. We make no claim against her for any definite sum. We do not know what a statement of the account will show; if it shows that West Virginia is not liable for any amount, that will end the matter. We only ask that your State will, through the proper authorities, unite with Virginia in stating the account between the two States in order that the question of her liability, if any, may be authoritatively ascertained. The work of your commission will, of course, be subject to such action as West Virginia might deem proper in the premises."

I beg leave to commend the statement of Virginia's case, as made in that address, to the attention and consideration of the court. Its perusal will most conclusively demonstrate to this court the rightfulness and righteousness of the cause of action stated in the bill.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM A. ANDERSON,
Attorney General of Virginia.

MARCH 14, 1907.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA

vs.

THE STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

REPLY BRIEF TO THE BRIEFS OF DEFENDANTS ON THE DEMURRER.

In the brief of Mr. Carlisle there appears, for the first time, the suggestion that this court cannot take jurisdiction of this case, because of a COMPACT alleged to have been entered into between the two States of Virginia and West Virginia, by which the question of the liability of West Virginia to Virginia on account of the public debt of the parent Commonwealth of Virginia was submitted to the arbitrament and award of the legislature of West Virginia.

The facts which it is claimed constitute such compact are as follows, viz.:

(1) That the constitution under which the State of West Virginia was admitted into the Union on June 20, 1863, contained the following provision:

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

(2) That on May 13, 1862, the legislature of (restored) Virginia passed an act entitled "An act giving the consent of the legislature of Virginia to the formation and erection of a new State within the jurisdiction of this State;" that by said act the consent of the legislature was given to the erection of the proposed new State "according to the boundaries and under the provisions set forth in the constitution for the said State of West Virginia, and the schedule thereto annexed, proposed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the twenty-sixth day of November, 1861."

(3) That the State of West Virginia was admitted into the Union on the 20th day of June, 1863, under the constitution framed by its convention, approved by the State of Virginia and the Congress of the United States. "And thus the consent of that body was given to all the provisions of the agreement and it became a legal and constitutional compact between the two States."

To this suggestion of a "compact" between the two States we have to say in reply:

1. That this is not among the grounds assigned in the formal demurrer heretofore filed in this cause, but is set up for the first time in the brief of Mr. Carlisle, and is again relied on in the brief of the Attorney General of West Virginia, subsequently filed.

2. That it is not a ground proper to be considered on demurrer, because it involves alleged facts which do not form any part of the case stated in the bill, viz., the fact that on May 13, 1862, the legislature of Virginia, by an act regularly passed, by a legislature duly assembled, consented to the erection of the new State of West Virginia "within the jurisdiction of this State." Not only is this alleged act not stated or admitted in the allegations of the bill, but it nowhere appears in the record of the case, nor is it set forth even in the briefs of counsel.

3. That the Commonwealth does not admit, but is prepared to deny, when opportunity is afforded it, that any such valid, constitutional act was ever passed by the legislature of Virginia, but that a demurrer affords no such opportunity to complainant to traverse the allegation of the existence of such act or of showing its non-existence.

4. That the existence and consequent effect of such an act should be asserted by a plea, to which replication might be made, or by answer, to which denial might be opposed, and thus an issue presented to which proper proof might be directed.

5. That from the official publications of the acts of assembly of the (restored) State of Virginia it distinctly appears that the regular session of that body adjourned sine die on February 13, 1863; that the constitution of the (restored) State of Virginia provides that extra sessions of the legislature may be convened only upon a proclamation of the governor of the Commonwealth calling the same; that while it does appear that the members of the General Assembly did assemble and were in session on the 13th of May, 1863, it does not appear from the proceedings of that body in the officially published journals of its proceedings that it had been called to meet by the proclamation of the governor.

6. That the constitution adopted by the convention of West Virginia, which assembled at Wheeling on the 26th of November, 1861, was not the constitution which was approved by Congress and under which the State of West Virginia was admitted into the Union, but that that Congress did refuse to admit the State into the Union under that constitution until the same was amended in certain indicated particulars, and the said constitution was accordingly so amended.

7. That even assuming all the facts relied on as constituting such a compact to be established, yet the conclusion deduced therefrom is fallacious and unsound, in this, viz., that the provision of the constitution of West Virginia that "an equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof," &c., does not import or mean that there was conferred upon the legislature power to adjudicate the fact or the amount of such "equitable proportion," or that there was lodged in the legislature any discretion whatever in the matter of such ascertainment.

In construing this provision of a constitution we must have regard to the subject-matter and the policy and purpose of the framers as disclosed by the instrument in all its parts. Here was a new State, about to be formed within the jurisdiction of an old State. That old State had, on August 20, 1861, just three months before, by an ordinance, provided "for the formation of a new State out of the portion of the territory of this State," and it had by the same ordinance declared that "the new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all the State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of this debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the new State during said period."

It is impossible to suppose that the new State should not have had this in mind when it framed its own constitution, and that when it provided that its legislature "shall ascertain the same as soon as practicable" it referred to the method of ascertainment prescribed by the Virginia convention in the very ordinance which provided for the creation of the new State. It seems to be at least reasonable to recognize that the ordinance of the Virginia convention and the provision of the West Virginia constitution should be taken as being in pari materia and construed together. It would then follow that what was meant by the expression the legislature "shall ascertain" was that the legislature should learn as soon as practicable the result of the method prescribed by the Wheeling ordinance, and then provide for the liquidation of the amount so ascertained.

It is simply preposterous to suppose that Virginia ever agreed to submit the matter of West Virginia's indebtedness to the arbitrament and award of West Virginia herself.

It should be enough to utterly repel this suggestion of a "compact" to inquire why, if such "compact" ever existed, in all the forty-three years that have elapsed since it was entered into, West Virginia has never, through her succession of governors, legislatures, and attorneys general, indicated and announced that it was upon such "compact" that she stood, and that to its terms and provisions she would hold Virginia, and why, through that long period, no step has ever been taken by West Virginia, through her legislature, to enter upon the performance of the duty which such "compact" imposed, or to notify Virginia that she stood ready and willing to enter upon such duty.

The suggestion that the case of Virginia vs. West Virginia, decided by this court thirty-six years ago, had restrained her from so doing is scarcely creditable to the intelligence of the inventor of that excuse.

Again, it is suggested in the briefs of demurrants, and was urged in oral argument, that Virginia had been released from all liability on account of the public debt of the old Commonwealth, evidenced by her bonds outstanding on January 1, 1861.

The grounds relied on to support this suggestion were indicated as follows, viz:

(1) That by the terms and provisions of the act of the General Assembly of Virginia of March 30, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for the funding and payment of the public debt" (Record, p. 13), and the acceptance thereof by the holders of the bonds of the Commonwealth, such holders released Virginia from all liability to them on account of the original public debt existing on January 1, 1861, and for which West Virginia was bound with Virginia, and they created with Virginia a new debt, evidenced by the new bonds of Virginia, for two-thirds of the amount of the old bonds, and accepted from Virginia a certificate showing that for the remaining one-third of such amount they would look for their payment only to such funds as might thereafter be obtained from West Virginia in satisfaction of her contributive share of the old public debt.

For reply to this ground we refer to the act itself. Its preamble fully recites its purpose. Its terms and provisions are contrived to strictly carry that purpose into effect. The third section of the act (Record, p. 14) shows that the bonds surrendered by the holders were not surrendered for cancellation and extinguishment of the obligations, save as to two-thirds of the amount of each bond so surrendered, and that as to the remaining one-third, which was estimated to be the amount of West Virginia's just and equitable proportion of the common debt, "the State of Virginia holds said bonds, so far as unfunded, in trust for the holder or his assignees." The bonds, as to such one-third, could not be "canceled" and at the same time "held in trust for the holder or his assignees." Virginia, by giving her new bond to take the place of the old bond, cannot be held to have paid her debt, but only to have substituted one security or evidence for another. A creditor, by surrendering an old bond and accepting a new one for the same debt from the debtor, has not received payment or satisfaction of the debt, unless such was the plain intention of the parties. The act itself as well as the certificate issued under it (Record, p. 72) show that such was not the intention.

(2) That by the act of the General Assembly of Virginia of March 28, 1879 (Record, p. 16), it was expressly provided, in the seventh section (Record, p. 19), "The acceptance of the said certificates for West Virginia's one-third, issued under this act, shall be taken and held as a full and absolute release of the State of Virginia from all liability on account of the said certificates."

Observe, the release of Virginia is not from her liability on account of the old bonds surrendered by the holder. These old bonds still are to remain, so far as the unfunded one-third of their amount, held in trust for the holder, but the release here provided for is expressly "on account of these certificates," by which was plainly meant that Virginia would not recognize these certificates as creating any distinct and substantive evidence of indebtedness on her part. They should not be construed to be causes of action against her. The holder, by surrendering his bond to be held in trust for him by Virginia, did thereby agree to await the result of Virginia's efforts to obtain from West Virginia the amount of her "just and equitable proportion of the public debt," which amount Virginia solemnly dedicated to the satisfaction pro rata of the one-third for which the bonds were held in trust by her. This provision in the seventh section of the act was designed to preclude the idea that these certificates created a new and distinct liability of Virginia. The previous language of the seventh section is—

> "The owners of all classes of bonds mentioned in this act, and who shall not yet have received certificates representing the remaining one-third of their principal and interest, due and payable by the State of West Virginia, shall receive certificates of a like character to those issued under the act of March 30, 1871, when they make such exchange," &c.

We have seen that the certificates issued under the act of March 30, 1871, declared on their face (Record, p. 72) that "the State of Virginia holds said bond so far as untunded in trust for the holder thereof or his assignees, and these certificates, issued under this act of 1879, were to be of "like character." It is manifest, then, that under the act of 1879 there was no release by the bondholders of the liability of Virginia on the bonds surrendered to Virginia and held by her in trust for the holder as to the one-third.

(3) That under the act of February 14, 1882, entitled "An act to ascertain and declare Virginia's equitable share of the debt created before and actually existing at the time of the partition of her territory and resources, and to provide for the issuance of bonds covering the same, and the regular and prompt payment of interest thereon" (Record, p. 21 et seq.), Virginia obtained a release of liability from the bondholders.

This was the act passed by the repudiating legislature, under the malign influence of the Mahone-Riddleburger reactionaries. This act was the fruitful source of all the litigation that so long disturbed the patience of this court, from Hartman vs. Greenhow, 102 U. S., 877, down through many years. By section 6 of this act (Record, p. 28) the form of a certificate was prescribed, which recites that "Virginia has this day discharged her equitable share of the — bond, * * * leaving a balance of — dollars * * * to be accounted for by the State of West Virginia, without recourse upon this Commonwealth."

Now this certificate does not even purport to be a contract on the part of the bondholder, nor does the act itself purport to alter, amend, or repeal the former acts. It was a mischievous attempt, conceived in wicked folly and wrought out in ignorance, to repudiate the public debt. It could operate only prospectively, and but few of the bonds remained at the date of its enactment on which it could operate. Whatever its purpose and intent were, it could have no sort of effect on the relations then existing between Virginia and West Virginia nor between Virginia and those of her creditors who had already surrendered their bonds and received the certificates.

That by the act of February 20, 1892, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the public debt of Virginia not funded under the provisions of" [the preceding act], (Record, p. 31), Virginia was released. This was the first of a series of acts looking to the employment of a commission or committee as an instrumentality through which an arrangement might be made with all the holders of the bonds of every description issued by Virginia, whether funded or unfunded, under which all such bonds and the certificates issued in connection therewith might be assembled and united action taken by them with and through Virginia to obtain a final settlement of West Virginia's liability for her share of the public debt, the recovery of the amount of such liability, and the payment thereof to Virginia and the distribution by Virginia of such amount among the persons entitled thereto.

This was followed by the act of March 6, 1894 (Record, p. 39), and the act of March 6, 1900 (Record, p. 41).

On page 43 of the record appears the "Report of the commission appointed and acting under the joint resolution of the General Assembly of Virginia approved March 6, 1894, and the act of the said General Assembly approved March 6, 1900, with respect to certain certificates issued by the State in connection with the debt of the original State of Virginia, and known as Virginia deferred certificates."

This report is contained between pages 42 and 82 of the record. It shows all that was done by the Virginia Debt Commission and the bondholders' committee in obtaining concurrent action on the part of the creditors; it shows the scrupulous and intelligent care taken by the General Assembly of Virginia in requiring that a large majority of such creditors should unite in their demands before the Commonwealth would take decided action; it required that an open, public, formal, and earnest request should be made upon West Virginia to come into a friendly settlement of these matters before any resort should be had to the courts for redress; it shows the extreme care taken by the Attorney General of Virginia to see that he was invested with full authority, and that all the conditions precedent to its exercise had been fully performed before he would institute the proceedings provided for in the acts; it shows, too, the address made by the Virginia Debt Commission to the legislature through their spokesman, Mr. Randolph Harrison (Record, p. 66), in which are the full history of the debt, the legislation had thereon, the repeated efforts made by Virginia to induce West Virginia to come into a friendly settlement, the sanction of law on which Virginia relied to support her demand, and the unpleasant consequences that must ensue in the event of West Virginia's persistent refusal to make a settlement.

The address was received with respectful silence, and it is of consequence to note that although it was heard by the assembled body of the legislative committees of West Virginia's intelligent legislature, that not then, or at any time since, as at no time in the long period that had passed, was any intimation given, or ground of refusal to the invitation urged, that West Virginia would not enter upon the proposed settlement because a COMPACT had been entered into between the two States, and which still subsisted, by which that very legislature had been chosen as the final arbitrator of the very matter as to which Virginia was asking a settlement.

IN EQUITY.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA, ...COMPLAINANT.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, ...DEFENDANT.

BRIEF FOR VIRGINIA, UPON MOTION TO ENTER DECREE REFERRING THE CAUSE TO A MASTER.

Drafts of a decree referring the cause to a Master have been submitted on behalf of the complainant, and the defendant, respectively.

[1]

There are some differences going rather to matters of procedure than to any question of principle, between the provisions of paragraphs III. and IV. of complainant's draft, as compared with paragraph VII. of defendant's draft, which will be apparent upon reading the two papers.

We respectfully ask that the provisions expressed in paragraphs III., IV. and V. of complainant's draft be embodied in the decree which the court shall enter, for reasons which will be apparent on reading those paragraphs.

[II]

Our serious objections to the defendant's draft of decree are particularly to paragraph II., but also to paragraphs III., IV. and V. thereof.

The draft submitted on behalf of the complainant directs the master to take an account ascertaining:

I.

"The amount of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia as of the first day of January, 1861, stating specifically, how and in what form the same was evidenced, by what authority of law and for what purposes the same was created, and the dates and nature of the bonds or other evidences of said indebtedness."

The defendant's draft adopts this paragraph.

Paragraph II. of plaintiff's draft directs the master to take the following accounts:

II.

"What amount and proportion of said indebtedness and of the interest accrued thereon, should in equity be apportioned to and be now paid by the State of West Virginia."

Paragraph II. of defendant's draft directs the master to take the following accounts:

II.

(a) "The amount of State expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, within the territory now included within the State of West Virginia since any part of said indebtedness was contracted, as provided by the ordinance adopted by the Commonwealth of Virginia at Wheeling, August 20th, 1861.

(b) "The aggregate ordinary expenses of the State government of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to January 1st, 1861, and since any part of said indebtedness was contracted.

(c) "All moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth of Virginia from the counties included within the State of West Virginia during said period."

Paragraph III. of plaintiff's draft directs that the master,

III.

"will make and return with his report any special or alternative statements of the accounts between the complainant and the defendant in the premises which either may desire him to state or which he may deem to be desirable to present to the court."

We respectfully object to paragraph II. of defendant's draft, on the ground that it seems to lend the sanction of the court in advance to a basis or scheme for the statement of the account, which is not shown by anything as yet in the cause to be either equitable or just.

Before any such question can be fairly adjudicated, it is necessary to the ends of justice, that there shall be a mass of evidence in the case, not yet introduced, which evidence the court should have the aid of its master in collating and thoroughly digesting.

There is by no means enough in the record to enable the court to come to any just or definite conclusion as to the precise scheme which it would be equitable to adopt in stating the account.

To do so at this stage of the litigation, would be to decide an important question in the case before the evidence necessary for a full understanding and just decision of that question is before the court. It would be largely to take a step in the dark, which might, and in all probability would, do injustice to one party or the other.

Our main objection to paragraph II. of defendant's draft is that its effect manifestly is to have the court prejudge the case as to the basis on which the account shall be stated.

On the other hand, in the draft of decree tendered by counsel for Virginia, we have not asked the court to prejudge the case upon any controverted question of law or fact.

The case is not now being submitted for a decision upon its merits.

It is submitted for a decree referring it to a master, to state and report to the court the data necessary to enable the court to justly decide it upon its merits—and all the complainant desires is an opportunity to show the court and its master what is the fair and equitable basis upon which the account between the two States should be stated, under all of the circumstances of the case, as they shall appear when the evidence is all in.

If it should then appear that the basis prescribed by the Wheeling ordinance is binding upon the parties, and must be followed as the basis upon which the account shall be made up, that basis would be adopted. But if it should be then manifest that that arbitrary basis of settlement is not the one on which the account should be stated, because it would, if applied to the facts of the case as they shall appear in the evidence, lead to absolutely unconscionable results and operate to impair the obligation of the contracts by which the common debt was created, contracts which were and are alike obligatory upon Virginia and upon West Virginia, or for any other valid reason, then the scheme of settlement indicated in the Wheeling ordinance would have to be discarded, and an equitable basis and scheme of settlement adopted.

It is due to frankness to say, that, while the Wheeling ordinance upon its face, prescribes an absolutely arbitrary basis of settlement, the representatives of Virginia are satisfied that upon a fair, reasonable and just construction of the language of that ordinance, and of the subsequent supplemental enactments, the scheme of settlement therein defined will, when applied to the facts as stated in the bill, and as it is believed they can be established by proofs, result in fixing the proportion of the debt of Virginia which West Virginia should assume and pay, inclusive of interest, at a very large sum, though not so large a sum as it would be equitable for West Virginia to pay.

The debt, a portion of which she was to pay, was an interest-bearing debt. It would be manifestly "just" and "equitable" that West Virginia should be required to pay interest as well as principal. Indeed, any settlement which does not require that State to pay interest during the long period of her default and refusal to pay anything, would be not only unjust, and inequitable, but iniquitous.

The ninth section of said ordinance required the new State "to take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861."

And section 8 of Article VIII., of the first Constitution of West Virginia, under the provisions of which she became a State, required that:

> "8. An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State;" and that "the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

So West Virginia came into the Union upon the distinct condition expressed in her Constitution, that she would assume an equitable proportion of the common debt of the undivided State, as it existed prior to January 1, 1861, and would provide for the payment of the accruing interest and the redemption of the principal thereof.

While it is believed that, upon the facts stated in the Bill and accompanying exhibits, and upon the proofs hereafter to be adduced in support thereof, West Virginia will owe a very large sum, even under the arbitrary scheme of the Wheeling ordinance, we submit that we should not, in the present status of the litigation, be tied down to the terms of that ordinance.

Indeed, its provisions were modified by the terms of the eighth section of Article VIII of the Constitution under which West Virginia was made a State, which provided that West Virginia should assume an equitable proportion of the common debt of the Commonwealth, principal and interest: And yet the defendant's draft excludes any item of interest from the account.

[III]

Another palpable objection to the defendant's draft is, that it excludes from the account the value of the property, assets, and money which West Virginia has received from the Commonwealth.

Upon any basis of just accounting, these items should be brought into the account.

If the account should be stated on the basis of the Wheeling ordinance, these items would manifestly be proper charges against West Virginia.

By the terms of that ordinance, Virginia's title to, and ownership of, all of the property and assets theretofore belonging to the Commonwealth remain intact.

By it, West Virginia would acquire no title to any of those assets or of that property. Framed as that ordinance was, by western Virginians, and arbitrary, and on its face unjust, as were the criteria by which it undertook to provide that West Virginia's proportion of the common debt should be computed, its authors were not so conscienceless as to also propose that the new State, after making such an inadequate contribution to its share of a debt which had been chiefly contracted by the votes of the representatives of its people and for their benefit, should also have a share of the property and assets of the Commonwealth, free of charge.

All that was, by the terms of that ordinance, to be ceded by the Commonwealth to the new State, was political dominion, and jurisdiction over the people and territory embraced in the new State.

The meaning and effect of the ordinance was to leave the title to, and ownership of, the assets and property of the Commonwealth in the Commonwealth.

If nothing more had been done or said by Virginia as to that property and those assets, than was said in the Wheeling ordinance, none of it ever would have become the property of West Virginia.

The Virginians who were the creators of West Virginia, who sat in the Wheeling Convention on the 20th of August, 1861, who constituted the convention which framed the first Constitution of West Virginia, and who constituted the Legislature of the restored government of Virginia which sat in Wheeling in 1862, and in 1863, fully recognized this to be true, for, pending the formation of the new State, and before the Legislature of Virginia had in any form given its consent to its creation out of the territory of Virginia, the Legislature of the restored State of Virginia, whose authority was supreme over the territory and people afterwards constituting West Virginia, and binding upon them, on the 3rd and 4th of February, 1863, passed the acts copied in the appendix to this brief.

These statutes constituted a part of the enactments out of which the State of West Virginia had its birth. It is particularly true of the act of February 3, 1863, that it was fundamental, so far as West Virginia was concerned: for it constitutes her title deed to a vast quantity of property, the title to which, by law and under the Wheeling ordinance, was vested in Virginia.

These statutes, together with the Wheeling ordinance, the first Constitution of West Virginia, the act of the United States Congress approved December 31, 1862, under which the new State was afterwards admitted into the Union, and the act of the Wheeling Legislature of May 13, 1862, constitute the constating instruments and acts by which her political existence was created, and her governmental powers and duties determined.

As was indicated by this court in its decision overruling the defendant's demurrer, the Wheeling ordinance, and Section 8 of Article VIII of the first Constitution of West Virginia, must be taken and read together: So also these constating acts of February 3rd and 4th, 1863, and particularly of February 3rd, 1863, must be taken and read together with Section 9 of the Wheeling ordinance, and with Section 8 of Article VIII of the first West Virginia Constitution, as together prescribing the terms and conditions on which the consent of the Commonwealth was given to the formation of the new State out of her territory, and the transfer to that new State when formed of any portion of the assets and property of the parent State.

Property and money large in quantity and value were thereupon transferred by Virginia to West Virginia, for all of which West Virginia must account, not only as an equitable obligation resting upon her, under the circumstances, but as a legal obligation put upon her by positive and binding enactment.

All of these just items of charge against West Virginia, are excluded from the account to be directed by the court by the terms of defendant's draft.

For convenience of reference, the "Wheeling Ordinance," and the acts of the Legislature of Virginia at Wheeling, passed February 3rd and 4th, 1863, are printed as an appendix to this brief.

[IV.]

Another objection to the account called for by defendant's draft, is that it does not direct any account to be taken ascertaining the amount and proportion of the debt of Virginia on and prior to January 1, 1861, which West Virginia should assume and pay, but contents itself with merely directing the arbitrary and inconsequential accounts defined in paragraph II of defendant's draft.

But our principal insistance is that defendant's draft of a decree prejudges the case in advance of a hearing upon the merits, while that tendered for the plaintiff cannot operate to the prejudice of either party, upon any material question in the cause; by this draft the adjudication of these questions being left to await a hearing after the Master's report shall be filed, upon the evidence then fully in the cause.

[V.]

The precise accounts called for by paragraph II of defendant's draft will be taken by the Master if he shall find it necessary and proper to take them in order to ascertain the amount and proportion of the Virginia debt which West Virginia should pay; and if the Master shall for any reason deem it unnecessary to take those accounts, the defendant can, under paragraph III of complainant's draft, have them stated as special accounts, if she shall be so advised.

Paragraph III of complainant's draft is designed to enable each party, or the Master, to have alternative, or special statements of the accounts made up on any basis on which either party or the Master may deem it proper or desirable that the same shall be stated.

By having the respective views and contentions of the complainant and the defendant thus presented in contrast in such concrete form, the court, with the assistance of the findings of the Master, will be enabled more readily and intelligently to reach a just conclusion.

[VI.]

If the inquiries defined in paragraphs III., IV., V. and VI. of defendant's draft have any pertinency to any question in the case, it must be because of something not yet in the record.

We object to them as being unnecessary and irrelevant.

(a) There is nothing in the cause, or so far as we know out of it, to show that there is any foundation in fact for the inquiry mentioned in paragraph III. of defendant's draft, as to whether Virginia has made any other contracts or arrangements with the public creditors, since January 1, 1861, in reference to the public debt. So that inquiry, though harmless, is useless.

(b) The accounts provided for in paragraphs IV. and V. of defendant's draft, are not pertinent to any issue in the cause.

Both relate to the certificates or receipts given by Virginia to the holders of the bonds issued by the Commonwealth before her dismemberment, who have deposited these bonds with her.

Those certificates are in the nature of a declaration of trust by Virginia, that she holds said bonds (so far as they have not been funded in the new securities which the Commonwealth has given for about two-thirds of the aggregate amount thereof, principal and interest), for the benefit of the owners of the bonds deposited with her.

It is impossible to see how those transactions could in any way affect any question which will arise in this cause.

The only function of those certificates is to show who are now entitled to the bonds which were so deposited with Virginia, and which she holds in her treasury for the benefit of these certificate holders, awaiting a settlement with West Virginia.

As is true of the inquiries mentioned in paragraph III., of defendant's draft, the objection to those provided for by paragraphs IV. and V. are that they are unnecessary and useless.

(c) The same objection applies to paragraph VI. of defendant's draft. That relates to the obligations which were issued by Virginia, as now constituted, in settlement of the two-thirds of the old bonds funded, and payment of which was assumed by her.

That is a matter with which West Virginia has nothing to do, and which does not affect the rights or obligations of either party in respect to the claims asserted in complainant's Bill.

Those new bonds given by Virginia for the two-thirds of the old bonds assumed by her, and accepted by the owners of the old bonds so deposited with Virginia, operated as a payment and discharge of the old bonds to the extent of the two-thirds thereof so funded.

West Virginia is not sued here to pay any part of that two-thirds so settled by Virginia. She is sued to have her assume and pay so much of the remaining unfunded third of the common debt of the undivided State, as may be West Virginia's equitable portion of the whole of the debt represented by the bonds of the original State. It has never been claimed or suggested that there was any liability on West Virginia beyond said unfunded third of the bonds of the original State which have been funded; or that West Virginia should pay more than one-third of the bonds issued by Virginia prior to the formation of West Virginia, which have not been funded.

The liability of West Virginia on account of the common public debt, has sometimes been estimated by Virginia or her representatives at one-third thereof, but never at more than one-third, and Virginia has undertaken to take care of the other two-thirds with which West Virginia has nothing to do.

It is true, that there are some millions of the debt of the undivided State, which Virginia has paid in full, and holds the obligations so taken up by her as a claim against the new State, to the extent of West Virginia's equitable liability for contribution therefor; and the extent of that liability can be ascertained and stated in the account directed by paragraph II. of complainant's draft.

There is no occasion for any of the accounts directed by paragraphs III., IV., V. and VI. of defendant's draft. If West Virginia wants any of them to be stated, she can have that done as a special statement under paragraph III. of complainaint's draft.

[VII.]

We object generally to the defendant's draft, that it does not direct the accounts which are necessary to be taken in order to intelligently, definitely, and fairly determine the amount and proportion of the debt of the undivided State, which West Virginia is equitably and justly bound to pay.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM A. ANDERSON,

COUNSEL FOR VIRGINIA.

APPENDIX.

Copy of the ordinance adopted by "the Wheeling Convention," providing for the formation of the new State afterwards called West Virginia.

AN ORDINANCE.

To provide for the formation of a new State out of a portion of the territory of this State.

(Passed August 20, 1861.)

All persons qualified to vote within the boundaries aforesaid, and who shall present themselves at the several places of voting within their respective counties, on the fourth Thursday in October next, shall be allowed to vote on the question of the formation of a new State, as hereinbefore proposed; and it shall be the duty of the commissioners conducting the election at the said several places of voting, at the same time, to cause polls to be taken for the election of delegates to a convention to form a Constitution for the government of the proposed State.

3. The convention hereinbefore provided for may change the boundaries described in the first section of this ordinance, so as to include within the proposed State the counties of Greenbrier and Pocahontas, or either of them, and also the counties of Hampshire, Hardy, Morgan, Berkeley and Jefferson, or either of them, and also such other counties as lie contiguous to the said boundaries, or to the counties named in this section; if the said counties to be added, or either of them, by a majority of the votes given, shall declare their wish to form part of the proposed State, and shall elect delegates to the said convention, at elections to be held at the time and in the manner herein provided for.

4. Poll books shall be prepared under the direction of the governor for each place of voting in the several counties hereinbefore mentioned, with two separate columns, one to be headed "For the New State," the other "Against the New State."

And it shall be the duty of the commissioners who superintended, and the officers who conducted the election in May last, or such other persons as the governor may appoint, to attend at their respective places of holding elections, and superintend and conduct the election herein provided for. And if the said commissioners and officers shall fail to attend at any such place of holding elections, it shall be lawful for any two freeholders present to act as commissioners in superintending the said election, and to appoint officers to conduct the same. It shall be the duty of the persons superintending and conducting said election, to employ clerks to record the votes, and to endorse on the respective poll books the expenses of the same.

If on the day herein provided for holding said election, there shall be in any of the said counties any military force, or any hostile assemblage of persons, so as to interfere with a full and free expression of the will of the voters, they may assemble at any other place within their county, and hold an election as herein provided for. It shall be the duty of the commissioners superintending, and officers conducting said election, and the clerks employed to record the votes, each before entering upon the duties of his office, to take, in addition to the oath now required by the general election law, the oath of office prescribed by this convention. It shall be the duty of the officers and commissioners aforesaid, as soon as may be, and not exceeding three days after said election, to aggregate each of the columns of said poll books, and ascertain the number of votes recorded in each, and make a return thereof to the Secretary of the Commonwealth, in the city of Wheeling, which return shall be in the following form, or to the following effect:

We, ... commissioners, and ..... conducting officer, do certify, that we caused an election to be held at ....., in the county of ....., at which we permited all persons to vote that were entitled to do so under existing laws, and that offered to vote, and that we have carefully added up each column of our poll books, and find the following results:

For a new State, ... votes; Against a new State, ... votes.

Given under my hand, this ..... day of ....., 1861.

Under which certificate there shall be added the following affidavit:

..... County, to-Wit:

I, ..., a justice of the peace, (or any officer now authorized by law to administer oaths,) in and for said county, do certify that the above named commissioners and conducting officer severally made oath before me, that the certificate by them above signed is true.

Given under our hand, this ..... day of ....., 1861.

The original poll books shall be carefully kept by the conducting officers for ninety days after the day of election and upon the demand of the executive shall be delivered to such person as he may authorize to demand and receive them.

5. The commissioners conducting the said election in each of said counties shall ascertain, at the same time they ascertain the vote upon the formation of a new State, who has been elected from their county to the convention, hereinbefore provided for, and shall certify to the Secretary of the Commonwealth the name or names of the person or persons elected to the said convention.

6. It shall be the duty of the governor, on or before the fifteenth day of November next, to ascertain and by proclamation make known the result of the said vote; and if a majority of the votes given within the boundaries mentioned in the first section of this ordinance, shall be in favor of the formation of a new State, he shall so state in his said proclamation, and shall call upon said delegates to meet in the city of Wheeling, on the 26th day of November next, and organize themselves into a convention; and the said convention shall submit, for ratification or rejection, the Constitution that may be agreed upon by it, to the qualified voters within the proposed State, to be voted upon by the said voters on the fourth Thursday in December next.

7. The county of Ohio shall elect three delegates; the counties of Harrison, Kanawha, Marion, Marshall, Monongalia, Preston, and Wood shall each elect two; and the other counties named in the first section of this ordinance shall each elect one delegate to the said convention. And such other counties as are described in the third section of this ordinance, shall, for every thousand of their population according to the census of 1860, be entitled to one delegate, and to an additional delegate for any fraction over thirty-five hundred; but each of said counties shall be entitled to at least one delegate. The said delegate shall receive the same per diem as is now allowed to members of the general assembly; but no person shall receive pay as a member of the general assembly and of the convention at the same time.

8. It shall be the duty of the governor to lay before the general assembly, at its next meeting, for their consent according to the constitution of the United States, the result of the said vote, if it shall be found that a majority of the votes cast be in favor of a new State, and also in favor of the constitution proposed to said voters for their adoption.

9. The new state shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all state expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the state government, since any part of said debt was contracted; and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the commonwealth from the counties included within the said new state during the same period. All private rights and interests in lands within the proposed State, derived from the laws of Virginia prior to such separation, shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed State, and shall be determined by the laws now existing in the State of Virginia.

The lands within the proposed State, of non-resident proprietors shall not in any case be taxed higher than the lands of residents therein. No grants of lands or land warrants issued by the proposed State, shall interfere with any warrant issued from the land office of Virginia prior to the 17th day of April last, which shall be located on lands within the proposed State now liable thereto.

10. When the general assembly shall give its consent to the formation of such new State, it shall forward to the Congress of the United States such consent, together with an official copy of such constitution, with the request that the said new State may be admitted into the union of States.

11. The government of the State of Virginia as re-organized by this convention at its session in June last, shall retain, within the territory of the proposed State, undiminished and unimpaired, all the powers and authority with which its has been vested, until the proposed State shall be admitted into the Union by the Congress of the United States; and nothing in this ordinance contained, or which shall be done in pursuance thereof, shall impair or affect the authority of the said re-organized State government in any county which shall not be included within the proposed State.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

OCTOBER TERM, 1907.

Original, No. 2

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA, Complainant,

v.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, Defendant.

BRIEF IN REPLY TO DEFENDANT.

HOLMES CONRAD,
Of Counsel.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

OCTOBER TERM, 1907.

Original, No. 4.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA, COMPLAINANT,

v.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, DEFENDANT.

BRIEF IN REPLY TO DEFENDANT.

On behalf of the complainant, an order is asked for referring this cause to a master to ascertain and report—

> "what amount and proportion of said indebtedness and of the interest accrued thereon should in equity be apportioned to, and be now paid by, the State of West Virginia."

The order further provides that the master shall—

> "make and return with his report any special or alternative statements of the accounts between the complainant and the defendant in the premises which either may desire him to state, or which he may deem desirable to present to the court."

The object of this latter provision is to have stated and presented to the court the several methods or plans which, in the view of the respective parties, properly expresses and illustrates the correct method of ascertaining the "just proportion" of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia which each party should bear.

The court, having before it the accounts, stated in accordance with the views of each side, may be better enabled to judge of their respective merits and elect between them, and so avoid the delay which would be occasioned by a recommitment of the report.

On behalf of the State of West Virginia it is proposed, in section 2 of the draft of the decree presented by counsel, that the master shall state in his report—

(a) The amount of State expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, within the territory now included within the State of West Virginia since any part of said indebtedness was contracted, as provided by the ordinance adopted by the Commonwealth of Virginia, at Wheeling, August 20, 1861.

(b) The aggregate ordinary expenses of the State government of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861, and since any part of the said indebtedness was contracted.

(c) All moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth of Virginia from the counties included within the State of West Virginia during said period.

Among the "ordinances and acts of the restored government of Virginia, prior to the formation of the State of West Virginia," passed in the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 11th of June, 1861, there was one ordinance, passed August 20, 1861, entitled "An ordinance to provide for the formation of a new State out of a portion of the territory of this State," the ninth section of which ordinance was as follows, viz:

> "The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of > Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of said debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during the same period," etc.

It will be seen at once that the provision of the proposed decree is a wide departure from the Wheeling ordinance, in that it does not even propose to ascertain by the method indicated West Virginia's "just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861." It was doubtless too apparent to the framers of the decree that the method proposed by the Wheeling ordinance had in fact, as we will show, no sort of connection with such public debt, and the account, stated as there suggested, might well have been taken, had no public debt of Virginia ever existed.

From the plan proposed by the Wheeling ordinance, as from that proposed in the decree offered by the defendant, there is altogether excluded any account of or reference to the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, evidenced by bonds and other evidences of indebtedness outstanding on the first of January, 1861. The only settlement which this method could effect would be a mere accounting between two sections of Virginia, inter sese, of the amounts which had been paid into the treasury of Virginia from each section and the amounts which had by the appropriations of their common legislature been expended in each section during the period between 1822 and 1861.

If it should appear from such an accounting that the counties lying west of the mountains, and now constituting West Virginia, had during such period paid into the treasury of Virginia more money than had been expended by the State legislature within said counties, what possible connection could the result reached by that account have upon the outstanding public debt of Virginia? Is there any provision or principle of law under which one county, or any number of counties, in a State can claim that the amounts paid to the State in the way of legal taxes shall not exceed the amounts which such counties receive from the State in the way of legislative appropriations? Can such counties claim that they should not be required to contribute their share of the public taxes toward the payment of the State indebtedness because, forsooth, they have through a period of sixty years paid into the State treasury more money than they have received from it? Coming to the case in hand, we have the request made to this court, in the decree offered by defendant, that the master, who may be directed to ascertain and report to the court what proportion and amount of the public debt of Virginia should justly and equitably be now borne by West Virginia, shall ascertain such amount and proportion by taking the aggregate amount of the taxes and ordinary State expenses collected from the counties constituting West Virginia and the amounts paid into said counties by legislative appropriation since 1822 and, deducting the smaller amount from the greater, report the balance so found to the court as West Virginia's just proportion of the public debt as of January, 1861.

The court has overruled the demurrer to the bill, and in doing so has stated in effect that the case stated in the bill entitles the complainant to the relief prayed, if such case is established by the proof. Is the case stated in the bill satisfied by the Wheeling ordinance?

The defendant was fully warranted in reiterating again and again in her answer that Virginia has always repudiated the Wheeling ordinance as binding on her, or as affording to any extent a satisfaction of Virginia's reasonable demand that West Virginia should contribute her just and reasonable share of that common indebtedness.

The Wheeling ordinance is impracticable, illusory, and altogether inadequate.

In suggesting here considerations which warrant us in insisting that the Commonwealth of Virginia cannot lawfully be bound by the ordinances of the Wheeling convention, which provided for the repudiation by the people of West Virginia of their liability to contribute toward the payment of the public debt of Virginia, we must not be understood as criticising in any manner the constitutional status of the State of West Virginia. It is as firmly entrenched and established as any State in the Union. What we do deny and repudiate is the claim asserted, that in matters relating to the pecuniary obligations—legal or equitable—of that State, the acts or ordinances of that convention which assembled in Wheeling in June, 1861, calling itself a convention of Virginia, and which professed to preserve, protect, and defend the interests of Virginia while actually engaged from its outset in providing for the dismemberment of Virginia—that such acts and ordinances, so far as they were designed to relieve West Virginia from her proper share of the public debt of Virginia, are of any legal, equitable, or moral binding effect on Virginia.

We object to West Virginia's proposed plan of settling the accounts, because—

(1) The Plan of the Wheeling Ordinance and of Defendant's Decree Is Impracticable.

It is charged in the bill and admitted in the answer of defendant that the public debt of Virginia, as of January, 1861, was about $33,000,000, and was evidenced by the bonds and other evidences of indebtedness of the Commonwealth of Virginia issued prior to that date. At the periods when said public debt was created the counties now constituting the State of West Virginia were each represented in the legislature of Virginia and in the executive councils of that State; that such representatives in the legislature advocated and voted for the creation of this debt and the application of its proceeds to the construction of works of internal improvement, which were designed for the benefit and welfare of the entire Commonwealth; that the region now forming West Virginia was the portion of Virginia toward which the greater part of such public works tended, and it was for the development of that region they were primarily designed. Hence it is that we insist that not only on the principles of international law, but on the homelier and more intelligible rules of common honesty and morality, as well as upon legal and equitable doctrines, West Virginia is as much bound as Virginia for this public debt.

The Wheeling ordinance ignores these solemn evidences of the public indebtedness, and proposes to go back to the year 1824, through a period of nearly sixty years, and inquire into the consideration of all these evidences of a common indebtedness, and into the various objects to which were applied the moneys obtained for them as they were made and issued. It requires the production of the vouchers and evidences of every dollar paid into the public treasury of the money derived from the taxation of the counties now forming West Virginia, and of every dollar appropriated and expended by Virginia within that territory. How far such requirement can be complied with at this time, with fullness and accuracy, it is impossible to tell.

It should be enough to suggest the danger and uncertainty attending such attempt, to remind the court that the State court-house, in the city of Richmond—the repository of many of the most valuable of Virginia's archives—was destroyed by fire at the evacuation of that city, at the close of the Civil War; and further, that many of the most valuable of the State records and files were ravaged during the period of the military government of the State and during the baleful period of "Reconstruction," when hostile aliens had control and possession of the State government and property. To require now that, in order to correctly ascertain the amount which West Virginia should contribute toward the payment of a public debt, evidenced by bonds to which that State was in effect a party, Virginia should make research through her files and records of nearly sixty years and produce the evidences of the items of receipt and expenditure, so far as the territory of West Virginia is concerned, is a peril and a hardship to which she should not be exposed.

It cannot be claimed that Virginia is in default in the performance of any duty resting upon her to West Virginia. The State officers at the capitol were the common agents of both the litigants here, and both are equally bound by their acts.

It is a fact which should not be forgotten, but to which due weight should be given in any equitable adjustment of the common burden, that it was the voluntary act of the people of West Virginia in withdrawing themselves from the body politic and corporate of Virginia and surrendering all right of participation in her councils and administration of her affairs that has contributed to the present conditions.

But another and more serious objection lies to the Wheeling ordinance as a plan of adjustment. Its evident purpose was to avoid and defeat the very liability to which this bill seeks to hold her. It proceeds on the theory that West Virginia cannot be held for any other amount than the difference between the amounts she—or her constituent counties—paid into the treasury of Virginia and the amount they received from that treasury during the sixty years preceding January, 1861; and also on the theory that those counties should not be held liable for any more of the public debt than was actually enjoyed by them by the extension of the works of internal improvement into or through their territory. It ignores the fact that the liability accrued when the bonds were issued and the money for them was obtained by the State, and not when the works for which that money was borrowed were actually constructed. The construction of the works was arrested by the war. They were not all completed within West Virginia. The war arrested, it did not prevent, the completed construction; that was prevented by the secession of West Virginia.

At the close of the war the spirit of energetic activity which the war had quickened found employment in every field of material development. Never in its history had this country known such an era of successful enterprise and development. The vast resources of wealth in timber, coal, gas, and oil would speedily have secured the capital for the realization of the plans which had been discerned and provided for by the generations of Virginia people sixty years and more before. The works of internal improvement for which this public debt had been created would have been completed, and Virginia's taxable wealth would very soon have been applied to the entire extinction of her public debt; but all this was defeated by the withdrawal of the territory now forming the State of West Virginia; and now that State appears in the unenviable attitude of possessing all the sources of wealth which induced the creation of the public debt—that debt which her people had largely contributed to making—while denying all liability for the bonds by which the debt was evidenced. She is willing to enter upon a settlement as prescribed by the Wheeling ordinance. That ordinance, as we have shown, provides a plan of settlement which omits altogether the public debt.

(2) The Commonwealth of Virginia is Not Bound by the Wheeling Ordinance.

It is true that this court has in one case recognized the restored State of Virginia—the "Pierpont government," as it is called in that case—as the State of Virginia. Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wallace, 39, was on a bill brought by Virginia "to settle the boundary line between the States of Virginia and West Virginia." The real question presented was the validity and effect of the proceedings by which the counties of Jefferson and Berkeley were transferred in 1866 from the Commonwealth of Virginia to the State of West Virginia. We have endeavored, without success, to obtain a copy of the record of the case, to learn what exactly were the issues presented by the pleadings and the course of the proceedings had in the case in this court. It appears (page 51) to have been argued at December term, 1866, and again, after this court had been differently constituted, at December term, 1870. Justices Davis, Clifford, and Field dissented from the judgment. The case has been rarely referred to in the subsequent decisions of this court. Chief Justice Chase, who sat in the case, did, in Cæsar Griffin's case (Chase Decisions, p. 412), referring to the State government of Virginia, say:

> "Indeed, it is well proven historically that the State and the government thus organized were recognized by the National Government. Senators and Representatives from the State occupied seats in Congress, and when the insurgent force which held possession of the principal part of the territory was overcome, and the government recognized by the United States was transferred to Richmond, it became in fact, as it was before in law, the government of the whole State. As such, it was entitled under the constitution to the same recognition and respect, in national relations, as the government of any other State."

And yet, notwithstanding this solemn judicial declaration as to the validity of Virginia's right to "recognition and respect in her national relations," it appears that on March 2, 1867, Congress, in an "Act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States" (14 St. L., p. 428), declared that—

> "Whereas no legal State governments or adequate protection for life or property now exists in the rebel States of VIRGINIA, etc.; * * * and
>
> "Whereas it is necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in said states, until loyal republican State governments can be legally established, &c."

2

By virtue of this act the entire State government of the restored State of Virginia was swept away—executive, legislative, and judicial—and Major General Godfrey Wetzel succeeded to all their functions.

So it seems that this restored State, on which had been poured the anointing balm of national recognition and acceptance, and which was "entitled under the Constitution to the same recognition and respect in national relations as the government of any other State," was now declared by the political branch of the National Government to have "no legal State government existing in it," and the government that did exist in it was totally abolished.

A natural inquiry is suggested: If the State government, which had been created in Wheeling in August, 1861, and removed to Alexandria in 1863, and transferred to Richmond in 1865, and continued in operation continuously until 1867, was then ascertained and declared to be "illegal," and so extinguished, when had it ceased to be a legal government, or when had it ever become a legal government? Surely, in its "national relations," it could not be both legal and illegal, or legal for some purposes and illegal for others.

Whether a State government exists, and whether it is a lawful and valid government, are political questions, and are to be determined by the political departments of the National Government and not by the judicial. The government of Virginia formed at Wheeling, and continued until after the close of the war, was recognized by the National Government as the true and lawful government of Virginia. In all of its political conduct and relations it must be assumed by the courts to be the true and lawful government of the State. But when it appears, as it does here, that the people of that part of the territory of Virginia which now forms the State of West Virginia were in fact the only people represented in the convention assembled at Wheeling on the 11th of June, 1861, and in the legislatures of Virginia held under the authority of that convention; that the leading object and purpose of those people in assuming the insignia—the title, powers, and authority of the Commonwealth of Virginia—was only to enable them to erect within the territory of Virginia a new State, and to appropriate to its uses all the property of Virginia under their control, and at the same time to absolve themselves from all liability on those bonds which they had united in making, as the evidences of that public debt which they had insisted on creating, then other considerations must apply.

The fiction that the people west of the Allegheny mountains were "the people of Virginia;" that the government which they organized in that region was the government of Virginia; that it became invested with all the powers and authority of the ancient Commonwealth of Virginia, ceases to apply. That fiction has served its purpose; the National Government has recognized this government, for all political purposes, as the Commonwealth of Virginia, and has accepted as valid and efficient the consent given by it to the erection of a new State within the borders of Virginia. Such recognition was the exercise of a power which belonged to the political departments alone. As to the propriety of its exercise the judicial branch is without jurisdiction to inquire. But into the conduct of this government in relation to its civil rights and liabilities—its liability on bonds and contracts, or under the application of equitable doctrines—the judicial courts may inquire, may take jurisdiction, and afford relief. Such courts may inquire into the validity and the bona fides of State action. It may ascertain and declare such action to be an impairment of the obligation of contracts. Inquisition may not be made into the motives or the good faith of the law-makers, whether in convention or in legislature, but the actions of these bodies may be annulled or disregarded when they appear to have been procured by fraud, as the judgments of the courts may be without impeachment of the motives of the judge who presided.

In Graham v. Folsom, 200 U. S., 253, this court, speaking of an attempt by a county to rid itself of debt, said:

> "But courts cannot permit themselves to be deceived. They will not inquire too closely into the motives of a State, but they will not ignore the effect of its action."

The Wheeling ordinance was ordained by a body of citizens who proclaimed themselves to be citizens of Virginia, assembled in convention to reform and establish her organic law. Their religious duty was to preserve, protect, and ameliorate her material interests; and yet it is manifest that their paramount object was to despoil Virginia of one-third of her territory; to erect upon that portion so cut off a new State, and to endow it with all the money and other property of Virginia found within the limits of the proposed new State. This purpose was actually carried into effect. These things were not conceived and performed to promote the welfare of Virginia. The citizens of Virginia by whom they were done looked not to the welfare of the State whose citizens they were, but to the welfare of that new State, for whose erection they were then providing and the dawn of whose creation was already appearing. The ordinance is entitled "An ordinance to provide for the formation of a new State out of the territory of this State," and was passed August 20, 1861. It should be construed, then, in the light of its professed object. Its provisions, so far as they related to the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and to the ascertainment of the contributive share which the new State of West Virginia should bear, must be construed as designed to secure the interests of West Virginia as opposed to those of Virginia. But one body corporate and politic then existed, but this very ordinance, as its title and body shows, was to partition this existing body and create another body, with opposing and antagonistic interests. The framers of the ordinance were in a little while to become citizens of the new and opposing body. They legislated for their own future interests and not for the interests of Virginia. Hence it was that in framing this section of the ordinance which prescribed a method of ascertaining the portion of the common burden to fall upon West Virginia they ignored the bonds which evidenced the common debt and provided for an adjustment which involves the items of receipts and expenditures between the two sections of Virginia through a period of nearly sixty years.

The fiction of the restored State of Virginia is again invoked to shield the actual truth. It cannot serve it. It has long ago fulfilled its only mission. It is now too thin and transparent to conceal the truth.

We have already shown, and the attention of the court cannot be too earnestly called to it, that the ordinance, in providing a plan for ascertaining the "just proportion" of the public debt which West Virginia should bear, makes no further reference to that public debt than the words contained in its opening sentence. The plan of ascertainment does not in any way involve the debt. It relates only to the amounts which the two sections of the Commonwealth had paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth and had received from that treasury since 1822. As a plan of ascertaining West Virginia's share of the public debt, it was illusory, disingenuous, and inadequate, and wholly in the interest of the people who framed and passed it.

It cannot be tolerated that one of the parties in interest should be the sole arbiter of the proportion or amount of the common burden which it will bear, or, as contended here, that a plan prescribed by one-third of the people of Virginia should be made the exclusive rule of measurement by which their share of the public debt of the whole people must be ascertained; and this although such one-third had separated themselves, and had met in convention, calling itself the convention of Virginia, which by an ordinance had provided for the erection of a new State within the territory occupied by them, and had by the same ordinance prescribed this rule for the ascertainment of its "just proportion" of said public debt. It is true, as stated in the answer, that Virginia has always denied that the Wheeling ordinance was binding upon her.

We submit that the debt for which West Virginia is liable is evidenced by the bonds and other evidences of indebtedness of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861. We have assumed—and no reason had been shown against it—that, taking into the account the population, area, and values of West Virginia, a reasonable and just proportion of the common burden was two-thirds of the public debt as the proper share to be laid upon Virginia and one-third of it as the proper share of West Virginia.

Apportioning the common burden on this basis, it would yet be competent for West Virginia to show on the taking of the account any just grounds that she may have of abatement of the amount thus ascertained, whether by payments, set-offs, or otherwise. The amount of the public debt is admitted to be about $33,000,000. The exact amount can be readily ascertained. This should form the basis of any accounting between the two States. It is a fixed and certain factor. The liability of West Virginia for a just and reasonable proportion of this debt is not denied. The proportion in which it should be borne by the two States must be determined by some rule which the court may prescribe or which the master may adopt. The result is then readily ascertained.

If the court desire it, the master may be instructed as to the principles, rules, and methods which he must employ in stating and settling the account, or he may be authorized to return with his report such alternative statements of the account as to him may appear proper or as either party to the cause may require.

In the argument of counsel for West Virginia in support of the demurrer to the bill it was pointed out that by section 8 of article 8 of the Constitution of West Virginia it was provided that—

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State; and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years;"

and that by the act of May 13, 1862, of the legislature of Virginia it was provided—

> "That the consent of the legislature of Virginia be, and the same is hereby, given to the formation and erection of the State of West Virginia within the jurisdiction of this State, * * * according to the boundaries, and under the provisions set forth in the Constitution for the said State of West Virginia, and the schedule thereto annexed, proposed by the convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 26th day of November, 1861."

From these two provisions the conclusion was deduced that a compact had been entered into by the two States, by which the legislature of West Virginia was made the sole arbiter of the fact and the amount of West Virginia's liability.

The court in its opinion (206 U. S., 320) disposed of that contention by saying:

> "When Virginia, on August 20, 1861, by ordinance provided for the 'formation of a new State out of the territory of this State,' and declared therein that 'the new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861,' to be ascertained as provided, it is to be supposed that the new State had this in mind when it framed its own constitution, and that when that instrument provided that its legislature should ascertain the same as soon as practicable, it referred to the method of ascertainment prescribed by the Virginia convention," the soundness of which reasoning cannot be questioned. The court was dealing with the question before it, which was the demurrer of West Virginia to the bill of Virginia. On the demurrer, all the allegations of the bill were taken for true. It was a fact that such ordinance had been adopted by the convention assembled at Wheeling. It was also a fact that the matters recited were in the acts and proceedings of the legislatures and conventions; but it was even more significantly the fact that the members of the Wheeling convention of August, 1861, and the members of the convention that framed the constitution for West Virginia knew what was in each other's minds, and what had been the acts of each body, for they were the same people, and it was all done in the same convention and at the same time, as appears by the official records (11 Wall., p. 41).

The court, in its opinion on the demurrer, did not decide or intimate any opinion as to the validity, or legal effect, or binding force of the Wheeling ordinance on the people of Virginia. It was manifest from the bill that the Wheeling ordinance was referred to there only as an additional expression by West Virginia people of their liability for the public debt. Virginia had never recognized for a moment that she was bound by an act which had so plainly for its object the casting upon her of the entire burden of the debt. The answer of defendant here complains that Virginia had persistently repudiated all responsibility for and liability under that ordinance.

The True Basis of Virginia's Right to an Accounting.

In paragraph VIII of the bill (Record, p. 10) five grounds are indicated on which the liability of West Virginia rests. The first of these grounds is that the mere partition of the territory created the liability. Writers on international law agree that—

"In the event of a State being divided into two or more independent sovereignties, the obligations which had accrued to the whole before the division are ratably binding on the different parts; for, as Story says, 'the division of the empire creates no forfeiture of previously vested rights of property.' And so ex contracio, where several separate States are incorporated into one sovereignty, the rights and obligations that belonged to each before the union are binding upon the new State; but, as General Halleck points out, of course the rule must be modified to suit the nature of the union framed and the characters of the act of incorporation in each particular case."

In 5 Moore on International Arbitrations, pages 4618-19, the case of the "Tarquin" is reported. On page 4619 it is said:

"This claim was in the nature of a public debt, founded upon the King's decree, and by the rule of international law public debts are not extinguished upon the division of a State into distinct States, whether that division be by war or by mutual consent; but they must be discharged either jointly or severally, according to the principles of justice and equity," &c.

The partition of territory alone, without agreement and without consent, imports an equalization of the burdens which were incident to the territory between the partitioners. The only question is, by what rule shall such equalization be made?

It is charged in the bill, and indeed is matter of public history in Virginia, that the sole purpose had in view in the construction of the works of internal improvement for which this debt was created was the development of the natural resources of the region to the west of the Alleghany mountains. The action of the delegates from that region in the General Assembly of Virginia confirms this.

The answer of the defendant denies this, and affirms that they were constructed for the development of the eastern part of the State. There were no natural resources in the eastern part that could be developed. The seacoast was there, and it was to bring to the coast the timber, coal, and other minerals of the west that the turnpikes, railroads, canals, and bridges were constructed. The reports of the Commissioners of Public Works through many years will attest this.

The enlightened sense of equity and justice throughout the civilized world has now become crystallized in the rule of international law which is stated above. That is the rule which Virginia asks may be applied here, and not the rule of the Wheeling ordinance, framed by the very people who then and now were guided and controlled by the single purpose of protecting West Virginia from this very liability.

It was not necessary that Virginia should have paid off the entire public debt before it could call on West Virginia for contribution. It was as much the debt of West Virginia as it was of Virginia. Virginia comes into court and invokes the application of those well-settled doctrines of equity of exoneration and of quia timet, and prays that the burden may be adjusted by the court in accordance with those doctrines and methods of procedure.

3 Pomeroy, Equity Juris., section 117 and notes.

The act "to provide for the funding and payment of the public debt," approved March 30, 1871 (Record, p. 13), recites that—

> "Whereas in the formation of the State of West Virginia, there were included within its boundaries about one-third of the territory and population of the State of Virginia; and whereas in the ordinance authorizing the organization of said State, it was provided that the said State should take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, which provision has not yet been fulfilled, although repeated and earnest efforts in that behalf have been made by this State, and will continue to be made as long as may be necessary; and whereas the people of this Commonwealth are anxious for the prompt liquidation of her proportion of said debt, which is estimated to be two-thirds of the same."

The estimate here referred to, of the proportions in which the "public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia" should be borne by the two States into which the territory of that ancient Commonwealth was now divided, was not recklessly or arbitrarily assumed, but was the result of a careful and intelligent reckoning. The territory and population of each State was considered, and the value of such territory taken into account, embracing therein all those constituent elements, natural and artificial, which enter into and make up the wealth of a State. The seacoast, the navigable rivers, the agricultural lands, with the works of internal improvements, in varying stages of completion, which formed the value of Virginia, and the vast mineral wealth of coal, gas, oil, and the forests of hardwoods of inestimable value that formed the wealth of West Virginia. These elements of wealth duly considered, it was thought that West Virginia should bear, at the very least, one-third of the common public debt. It is charged in the bill that "West Virginia had vast potentialities of wealth and revenue in the undeveloped stores of mineral and timber which had been known for many years prior to the first of January, 1861, and their prospective values, if made accessible to the markets of the country were understood to be well nigh beyond computation." The answer of West Virginia admits the charge, but avers "that the same was inaccessible, and of very little value on the first of January, 1861." And yet on July 1, 1862, when the restored State of Virginia, through her Senators and Representatives in Congress, was endeavoring to have the new State erected within the territory of Virginia, one of those Senators, Willey, employed as an argument in support of the creation of a new State, the existence of the vast resources of mineral wealth in that territory. He said:

> "Here is an opportunity presented to the Senate to erect northwestern Virginia into a free State, a condition for which she was designed by the God of nature—the richest portion of this broad land in mineral resources—with inexhaustible marble quarries equal to those of Egypt and very similar; rich in inexhaustible fountains of salt and oil, and forests exceeding any of those that ever waived upon Mount Lebanon itself, that have remained from the foundation of the government of the State of Virginia, undeveloped, useless, valueless, simply because we have not been able to organize improvements within and under the control of the western section."
>
> Congressional Globe, second session of Thirty-seventh Congress, 1861-'2, p. 3037.

And on the 14th day of the same month, in the same debate, he said:

> "This new proposed State contains within its towering hills and mountains treasures richer perhaps than can be found within the limits of any other State within this Confederacy, and there they have lain ever since the establishment of this Government, undeveloped, unworked, valueless, and they must continue to remain so unless a different policy is pursued."
>
> Ibid., p. 3317.

It was this potentiality of wealth that those railroads, turnpikes, canals, and bridges were being constructed by Virginia to develop and realize for which this public debt of the Commonwealth was created. It was this vast wealth which was in the view of Senator Willey, in 1862, when in the Senate of the United States he urged it as a strong ground why the new State should be laid off in the limits and from the territory of Virginia; that such new State would be a free State, and all this wealth of which Virginia would be thus despoiled would become the exclusive property of the new State, and that the provision made by the Wheeling ordinance for ascertaining the just proportion of the public debt of Virginia to be borne by the new State would not embrace or take into account any portion of this public wealth. It was this vast wealth which, in the estimation of Virginia in 1871, imparted so great value to the hilly and mountainous territory of West Virginia that, in computing the just proportion of the public debt which West Virginia in equity and good conscience should bear, she reckoned with extreme moderation that the territory of West Virginia was equal at least to one-third of that of Virginia, and so did she apportion their respective contributive shares of this common liability.

But it is suggested that an account is necessary to ascertain the amount which West Virginia should contribute, and, further, that such account should be taken on the principles of a partnership account.

We cannot perceive in the relations existing between Virginia and West Virginia any of the features which distinguish a partnership. A partnership has been defined by this court to be—> "a voluntary contract between two or more competent persons to place their money, effects, labor and skill, or some one or all of them, in lawful commerce or business, with the understanding that there shall be a communion of profits thereof between them."

What was the contract and who were the parties and what were the terms of any partnership when the common debt, here sought to be apportioned, was created? The Commonwealth of Virginia was a political body, a sovereign corporation, a member of the Federal Union when she created this debt, and issued her bonds therefor. The counties of Virginia, which now form the State of West Virginia, were in no sense partners with the other counties of Virginia. They were all members of one body. The welfare of one member was the welfare of the entire body. These counties, by their own voluntary act, seeking their own exclusive selfish interests, procured their separation from the body corporate and politic of Virginia, and, after they had done so, they sought and obtained the political recognition and support of the National Government to gain for themselves separate political existence and autonomy. On the principles of international law, they remained liable for a just proportion of the public debt of Virginia. What doctrine or maxim of equity can be invoked to entitle these counties to demand a marshaling of the assets of Virginia? What indeed would be counted as constituting those assets? If a partnership existed, then all the partnership fund constituted the assets and not any particular part of such fund. The debt which is here sought to be apportioned was not created on the security of any particular asset of Virginia. It was created on the faith and credit which the lenders of money extended to the Commonwealth of Virginia. The bonds which the Commonwealth issued were the obligations of the whole State and for which the entire State was liable. They were not the bonds of the counties of Virginia jointly. They were the several obligations of one body politic. The debt evidenced by them was the debt of the State, sanctioned and imposed by the people of Virginia, through their General Assembly, acting within constitutional limits. How the money derived from these bonds was expended by legislative appropriations, or where it was expended, are considerations which should not even be inquired into in this proceeding, for it matters not in the present inquiry whether the entire debt of $33,000,000 was expended within the limits of Virginia or of West Virginia, so that it was expended by a legislature in which all parts of the State were fully represented. The expenditure must be conclusively presumed to have been made in good faith and for the welfare of the whole body politic. Two thousand five hundred years ago Æsop illustrated this in the fable of the "Belly and the Members." The liability, or the measure of the liability, of the two States into which the territory has since been divided can in nowise depend upon the amount of the proceeds of the loan which may have been expended in each. If any valid, actual, legal agreement was entered into between the two States, by which the proportion in which they should contribute to the common burden was fixed, or if any means were agreed on by which such proportion should be ascertained, then such agreement must control. But if no such agreement can be shown, then on principles of international law each State remains liable for the whole debt, and the apportionment of the burden between them is a juridical matter to be settled by the courts.

How shall the proportions of this debt to be borne by the two States, respectively, be ascertained? Virginia, in 1871, estimated that it should be borne in the proportion of two-thirds by Virginia and one-third by West Virginia. She formed this estimate by computing the vast undeveloped mineral wealth of West Virginia—her "unsunned gold"—as making her equal to one-third of the entire value of old Virginia, including therein all the works of internal improvement, completed and uncompleted, that remained within the limits of the present Virginia. But suppose this estimate of Virginia should not be adopted, how should the court ascertain the just proportion? It is suggested that West Virginia should be charged with only so much of the public debt as was actually expended within her borders, and Virginia should be charged with so much of said debt as was actually expended within her borders. But we have shown that wherever or however the amount of money represented by the debt was expended within the limits of old Virginia, it was all expended for the benefit of the whole body of the State. That the counties constituting West Virginia seceded from the old State before the improvements were completed, and thus prevented their completion, and that she sought by such secession and has now succeeded in monopolizing for her own exclusive use all those stores of natural wealth which would have afforded to the old State the basis of taxation by which the public debt could be easily and speedily discharged, surely affords her no equitable ground for an apportionment of liability on such a basis. If an accounting is to be had on the basis of the wealth of the respective States, then in estimating such wealth it will be impossible to ignore or disregard the mineral wealth of West Virginia. Her coal and oil and gas and marble and timber must be taken into the account, not according to their taxable values in 1861, but according to the values which would have been given to them by such an appraisement as would have been made of them in a suit for partition. The present material condition of West Virginia is but the fulfillment of the expectations that were entertained by the people of Virginia a hundred years ago. It was foreseen when the scheme of internal improvements was entered upon in 1820. It was foreseen and appreciated by Senator Willey in 1862. It was distinctly appreciated and estimated by the legislature of Virginia in 1871, when it reckoned the just proportion of the public debt of Virginia as of 1861 which should be borne by West Virginia at one-third of the aggregate amount of that public debt.

The "Special Agreement" Theory.

It is claimed on the part of West Virginia (Brief for Defendant, p. 11) that a "special agreement" was entered into between the States of Virginia and West Virginia, by which the method prescribed by the Wheeling ordinance was adopted as the exclusive method of ascertaining the amount of that "just proportion" which it was declared West Virginia should bear.

The "special agreement" relied on by defendant appears to be that feature of the Wheeling ordinance which prescribes the method for ascertaining what is the "just proportion" of the public debt to be borne by West Virginia. Section 9 of the Wheeling ordinance presents two distinct features, which must not be confounded with each other, viz: (1) A recognition of the liability of West Virginia for a just proportion of the public debt, expressed in these words:

> "The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861."

It was this feature that is referred to in paragraph XVIII of the bill, and which defendant, on page 7 of his brief, insists is a recognition by plaintiff of the terms of the ordinance. (2) The method by which such "just proportion" shall be ascertained, expressed in these words—

> "to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government, since any part of said debt was contracted; and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during the same period."

In pointing to the Wheeling ordinance as a recognition of West Virginia's liability for a just proportion of the common debt, section XVIII of the bill cannot be construed as an admission of the validity of the method of ascertainment proposed in the second feature. That section refers only to the "liability" recognized, and it indicates the ordinance as the one "in which the method of ascertaining her liability on account of said debt is prescribed," without in any way assenting to or conceding the validity of such method.

Suppose the second feature of the ordinance had prescribed as the method of ascertaining the just proportion that West Virginia should pay one mill on every thousand dollars of the public debt, or that it should pay one mill on every thousand tons of coal shipped from the State, could it be truly contended that the Commonwealth of Virginia had deliberately consented thereto? Yet, as I have endeavored to show, these supposed methods are not one whit more whimsical and fantastic than the method actually proposed, because the difference between the amount that a county has paid into the State treasury, in a given period, in taxes, and the amount that has been expended within that county by legislative appropriations during that period has no more connection with the public debt of the State than the number of tons of coal shipped from such county during such period can have.

There can be no question as to the power of two States, or of two sections of the same State, to enter into compacts within the conditions existing in the cases of Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat., 1, and Wharton v. Wise, 153 U. S., 155, or as to the soundness of the rule stated in Wharton v. Wise, p. 173:

> "The consent of Congress to any agreement or compact between two or more States is sufficiently indicated—when not necessary to be made in advance—by the adoption or approval of proceedings taken under it."

But can it be said that Congress ever saw or considered the Wheeling ordinance or ever knowingly adopted any proceedings taken under it? Congress had before it the constitution which had been framed for the proposed new State, and the act of May 13, 1862, purporting to give the assent of Virginia to the erection of this new State. Nothing appears in the constitution as to this method of ascertaining West Virginia's share of the debt. The provision of the constitution appears in article 8, section 8, and is as follows:

> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State; and the legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof, by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest, and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

There it appeared to Congress that adequate provision had been made for the payment of West Virginia's "equitable proportion" by requiring the legislature to ascertain the same, and then provide a sinking fund for its payment.

Can it be supposed, in view of the debates that occurred in Congress on the bill for the admission of West Virginia into the Union, that such bill would have become a law if it had appeared in the constitution under which it sought admission that it proposed to ascertain its equitable proportion of the debt by deducting from the amount of taxes it had paid since the first debt was incurred the amount it had received in the way of legislative appropriations? It gained admission into the Union by the method indicated in its constitution. It now proposes to fall back on a method which would have defeated its effort to be admitted into the Union.

Sections 5 and 7 of Article 8 of the Constitution.

On pages 18 and 19 of their brief counsel for defendant insist that the words "previous liability" in the 5th section and the words "public debt" in the 7th section do not refer to West Virginia's liability to her equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

What other previous liability of the new-born State existed besides the public debt of the old State? Many of the States of the Union now provide in their constitutions that no public debt of the State shall be created. But counsel for defendant insist that while the State may be thus prohibited from creating a public debt, it is not prohibited from creating a public liability, and that when a public liability is created then the legislatures may create a public debt to extinguish the previous liability. It is not to be supposed that the court can be favorably impressed by such linguistic jugglery. The liability of West Virginia for a just or equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia existing previously to the formation of this constitution was recognized by the constitution, and provision was made to meet it. This provision contemplated the issuance of bonds of the new State, but it was intended to leave no room for the creation of any other public debt, and hence it was that in this section 5 of article 8 it was provided that "no debt shall be created by this State except to meet * * * a previous liability of the State," &c. So in section 7 of article 8 it was provided that the legislature may sell all the stocks owned by the State in banks and other corporations, "but the proceeds of such sale shall be applied to the liquidation of the public debt," &c. What was the public debt?

Note, it is not a, or any public debt, but the public debt. There was and could be but one public debt, and that was the public debt which West Virginia had in common with Virginia, and as part of Virginia previously created.

Counsel argue on page 20 of their brief that because this same provision appears in the later constitution of West Virginia, adopted in 1872, that for that reason it could not have been intended to apply to the public debt of Virginia prior to 1861. It is true that this provision was repeated in several constitutions adopted by West Virginia, as was also section 8 of article 8; but it may be also true that when control of the State passed from the hands of the native-born citizens and into the hands of citizens from other States who had drifted into West Virginia and had filled all the high offices of the State, then these provisions disappeared from the later-formed constitutions. The reason for such disappearance is not far to seek. Doubtless the hope was indulged that a repudiation by omission of this declaration of liability might soon warrant a repudiation by express disavowal of liability, a stage which, it appears, has now been reached.

Both Virginia and West Virginia in their respective constitutions prohibit the creation of any more public debts. Virginia has learned from experience. West Virginia has taken warning from the example before her. But both States have recognized that it might become needful to issue new bonds in order to extinguish the existing debt which rested upon both of them, and hence it was that each State provided that the prohibition should not extend to "previous liability," referring in each case to their respective liabilities for the existing public debt of the old State.

It is evident that West Virginia now rests her entire defense to the case stated in the bill on the recognition by this court of the Wheeling ordinance as a contract between the States of Virginia and West Virginia and now binding on the Commonwealth of Virginia. On the part of Virginia it is submitted that she had no part or lot in that matter. It surely lacked one essential element of a contract; the people who proposed the ordinance, and the people who accepted it were the same people. They did not coexist at the same time as parties to the contract. They contracted with themselves at successive stages of their continuing existence. When West Virginia was created Virginia ceased to be in that territory. True, the governor, who was a citizen of one of the counties of the new State, did not relinquish his titular office of governor of Virginia, but moved his seat of government to Alexandria and remained there within the Federal military lines. He assembled a handful of men, who masqueraded as the General Assembly of Virginia, and then on the 11th of April, 1864, organized a Constitutional Convention of Virginia, and adopted a new constitution for Virginia, the 27th section of which is quoted on page 22 of defendant's brief, by which the Wheeling ordinance was held to have no binding force upon Virginia. It was all a grim farce. But it cannot be denied that they had as much legal right to repudiate its binding force on Virginia as they had in August, 1861, to impart such binding force to it. The existing public debt of Virginia in January, 1861, was $33,000,000, as admitted in the answer to the bill. This was the debt of West Virginia, or of the counties constituting it, as much as it was of the other counties of Virginia. If the wealth of West Virginia was equal to one-third of the wealth of the whole Commonwealth of Virginia, then the equitable proportion of that debt to be borne by West Virginia should be $11,000,000 as of January, 1861, and that amount should now be adjudged to be due by her.

Sections 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the Decree Proposed by Defendant.

These sections of the decree are also objected on behalf of the complainant on the ground that they seek inquiries into matters that have no apparent connection with the ascertainment of West Virginia's "just proportion" of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to January 1, 1861. The amount of that public debt as of the date named is admitted to be about $33,000,000. The exact amount is susceptible of ascertainment. The only other question is as to the just proportion to be borne by West Virginia. If the proportion heretofore fixed by Virginia, of one third, is objected to, then it remains for the court to determine, through its master, or in such other way as it may adopt, what the just proportion is. It has been assumed on the part of Virginia that the evidence relevant to such inquiry, which is altogether documentary, consisting of the public records and files of the Commonwealth of Virginia, could not appropriately be laid before the court at this stage of the cause, but would be produced before the master at such times and in such manner as he might require.

Should it be found that one-third of the public debt is the just proportion to be borne by West Virginia, then any inquiry into the manner in which Virginia has settled with her creditors for the two-thirds of said public debt, assumed by her as her just proportion, can have no relevancy to the inquiry here.

The certificates issued by Virginia represent only the bonds which were surrendered by the creditors and are now held by Virginia in trust for the owners of them; as to the one-third set apart as West Virginia's just proportion of the debt evidenced by such bonds, the bill sets forth with minuteness of detail the amount of such certificates, which has been assembled by the committee representing such bondholders, under the plan adopted for the settlement between Virginia and her creditors and under the acts of the General Assembly of Virginia, all of which appear in pages 39-66 of the bill and exhibits, no part of which appears to be denied by the answer of the defendant.

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM. 1907.

IN EQUITY. ORIGINAL, NO. 4.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA, Complainant

vs.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, Defendant.

REPLY BRIEF FOR VIRGINIA UPON MOTION TO REFER THE CAUSE TO A MASTER.

The propositions contended for by the counsel for West Virginia in their elaborate brief upon the above motion will be here reviewed, though not in the order in which they are presented.

AS TO ORDER OF PROCEDURE.

While this court in Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 14 Peters, 210, 257, considered it proper that the proceedings in that case should "be regulated by the rules and uses" of the English Court of Chancery, it declared that:

> "in a controversy where two sovereign States are contesting the boundary between them, it will be the duty of the court to mould the rules of chancery practice and pleading in such a manner as to bring this case to a final hearing on its real merits. It is too important in its character, and the interests concerned are too great, to be decided upon the mere technical principles of chancery pleading." 14 Peters, 257.

It will not be gainsaid that this language applies with added force to this case.

The only rule of chancery practice adopted by this court, is in accordance with this just conception of its powers and duties, and is as follows:

> "Rule 3. This court considers the former practice of the courts of King's bench and of chancery, in England, as affording outlines for the practice of this court; and will, from time to time, make such alterations therein as circumstances may render necessary."

Neither the technical rules of practice obtaining in the circuit courts of the United States; nor those approved by Mr. Bates and other learned text-writers; nor those sanctioned by any other tribunal whatever will control this court in the matter of the procedure and processes which it may deem necessary and proper to adopt, in order to attain the ends of justice.

This results from the very nature of its powers and duties in a case like this, as to which its jurisdiction is not only exclusive, but final, plenary and absolute.

In this its only rule upon the subject, the court has indicated the former practice of the courts of chancery in England as "affording outlines" for the practice of this court in chancery causes.

If we look to the practice of the English courts in chancery, and to the chancery practice sanctioned by the courts and jurists of this country, precedents and authorities will be examined in vain to find any sanction for the proposition that each of the six rules laid down by Mr. Bates in the section quoted in the brief for West Virginia, must be complied with before there can be a decree for an account in a case like this; nor are we willing to believe that the learned counsel for the defendant would carry their contention to any such extremity.

The general rule is that a decree for accounts, or order of reference is from its nature interlocutory, because it directs an inquiry and contemplates the bringing of new and additional facts into the record. It would be practically impossible to state in advance all the principles of law which might apply to the facts as they might thereafter be developed. As if an account of debts were ordered against a partnership, corporation, or estate, it would be impracticable to state in advance what rules of law should obtain in regard to the establishment of such debts; as for instance, what might be valid defences, such as failure, or want of consideration, the statute of limitations, payment, set-off, &c., any of which might be interposed against the different debts as presented, and no one could say in advance to what extent they might be applicable or valid.

"A decree is understood to be interlocutory whenever an inquiry as to a matter of law or fact is directed preparatory to a final decision." Bebee v. Russel, 19th How., 285, and in the same case we find the following citation from the 2nd volume of Perkin's Daniel's Chancery Practice 1193, "that the most usual ground for not making a perfect decree in the first instance, is the necessity which frequently exists for a reference to a master of the court, to make inquiries, or take accounts, or sell estates and adjust other matters which are necessary to be disposed of, before a complete decision can be come to upon the subject matter of the suit," p. 285.

The primary purpose of this suit is to invoke the equitable jurisdiction of "Account"; to have the account between the parties, involving more or less complicated transactions, made up of a vast number of items running through a period of more than seventy years, stated, in order to obtain from the defendant the amount for which she shall be thus ascertained to be equitably liable.

The principal facts upon which the complainant's claim depends, namely; the formation of the new State out of the territory of the Commonwealth of Virginia; the existence of a public debt of the undivided State of some $33,000,000.00 at and before that event, a large part of which remains an unsatisfied and binding obligation upon both States; the ordinances, public acts, and fundamental stipulations and enactments by which West Virginia assumed, and became liable for an equitable proportion of that common indebtedness,—all of these and other material facts are alleged in the bill, and are, either not controverted by the defendant's answer, or are established by the documents and public records filed with the bill, or are a part of the history of the two States, and of the times, and of the country.

The facts which justify the complainant in instituting her suit for an accounting, and for a decree thereupon, are thus sufficiently established to entitle her to a decree to that end. Indeed, we had supposed that the decree of this court overruling the defendant's demurrer, had pretty well settled this.

If precise proof of Virginia's claim should be required to be made, before a decree for an accounting would be entered, it would be necessary for the court to devote months of its time to the examination of the books, accounts, documents, and transactions of the Commonwealth, in connection with the creation of the debt, the expenditures made in the counties now constituting West Virginia, and the payments made from those counties into the treasury of Virginia, during a period of forty years or more, and also to the examination of the records of both States in reference to the lands and other property which West Virginia received from Virginia.

It is difficult to conceive how a stronger case could be presented for the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction of "Account," "in order to bring the case to a final hearing upon the merits."

But while the case is not in a condition for the court to intelligently and fairly "pass upon all the issues made in the pleadings," it is in condition for a decree of reference, in which decree the principles upon which the account shall be stated should be settled, so far as it is practicable to do that from the data now in the record, and without doing injustice to either party.

In the draft of decree tendered on the 7th of last December by counsel for the complainant, some important questions were left open which we are prepared now on further consideration to say, it would be as well, or better, to have settled in advance.

To this extent we concur, upon this point, in the views presented by the learned counsel for West Virginia.

While the basis of settlement prescribed by the Wheeling Ordinance is, as we have always considered it, arbitrary and inequitable, we have never taken the position that that Ordinance, reasonably and fairly construed, and taken and applied together with the Act of the Restored Government of Virginia of February 3, 1863, and section 8 of Article VIII of the Constitution under which West Virginia became a State, was not binding on both States.

While thus construed and applied, the amount and proportion of the public debt assignable to West Virginia will doubtless be much less than it would have been equitable for her to have assumed and paid, we are constrained to the opinion that the plan of settlement prescribed and sanctioned by the foregoing enactments is binding upon Virginia.

It is due to candor also, to say that, although it is true that the Convention which enacted the Wheeling Ordinance, was not called, constituted, or organized in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution and laws of Virginia, and was a revolutionary body; although it could then have been shown that that Convention and its acts were invalid, and may now be contended that the Convention and the Wheeling Ordinance which it adopted, were fictions, nevertheless, they and their offspring, the Restored Government of Virginia, and the State of West Virginia, have since received such recognition and sanction from every department of the United States Government, and from the Government of Virginia also, that, what, in its inception, was a fiction, has become a legal fiction, and now has all of the force, if not all of the virtue, of a legal verity.

We are constrained to recognize the following propositions as true:

(a) That the State of West Virginia could have no legal birth or existence without the consent of the Legislature of Virginia.

(b) That the only Legislature of Virginia which ever gave its consent to the formation of West Virginia, was the Legislature of the Restored Government which, sitting at Wheeling on the 13th of May, 1862, gave its consent to the formation of the new State, "according to the boundaries and under the provisions set forth in the Constitution for the said State of West Virginia, and the schedule thereto annexed, proposed by the Convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 26th of November, 1861."*

(c) That the Act giving such consent and the Legislature which passed it, depended for their validity upon the validity of the Wheeling Ordinance under which the Restored Government of Virginia was organized.

(d) That said Convention, and its acts, and the Government which it established, have been legitimated, by recognition by every department of the Government,—by the President of the United States in his official intercourse and dealings with the Governor and officials of said Restored Government, by approving the bill for the admission of West Virginia, and by his proclamation announcing the admission of the new State into the Union; by the Congress of the United States in the admission of Senators Willey and Carlisle elected by the Legislature of the Restored Government, by the passage of the Act approved December 31, 1862, admitting West Virginia into

---

*At the time of the argument upon the demurrer, counsel for complainant were under the impression that this Legislature had not been convened pursuant to the proclamation of the Governor, without which proclamation the meeting of the Legislature would have been, under the then Constitution of Virginia, invalid; but subsequently the Executive Journal of the Governor of Virginia at Wheeling, for 1862, was found, and it appears from it that Governor Pierpont issued a proclamation under which the special session of the Legislature in May, 1862, was held.

the Union, and by other acts; and by the United States Supreme Court, by its decision in Virginia v. West Virginia, 11 Wallace, p. 39, in which the Wheeling Convention and this very Wheeling Ordinance and the Wheeling Legislature of Virginia, are recognized as being a Convention, an Ordinance, and a Legislature of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

We are forced by these considerations to conclude that it too late now to question the binding effect of the Wheeling Ordinance.

Still, it cannot be forgotten that there was not a man in the Virginia, and West Virginia, Wheeling Conventions of 1861-2, and 3, from any of the counties or cities which now constitute Virginia, except the four men admitted to seats in the Virginia Convention at Wheeling, of August, 1861, two of them from Alexandria and two from Fairfax county, both parts of the present State of Virginia; that there was no pretence that there was any representation whatever in said Conventions, or in the Legislature of the Restored Government of Virginia, from more than two-thirds of the territory and people of Virginia; and that, in a number of instances, the very same men acted as the representatives both of the people of Virginia, and of the people of West Virginia, in said Conventions and Legislatures.

The indisputable facts are, that it was the people of the counties and cities now constituting West Virginia, or their representatives, who were dealing with the people of the same counties and cities, or their representatives, and undertaking to make covenants and stipulations with themselves which would bind all the people, and the entire Commonwealth of Virginia, in matters of the utmost importance to them.

Among other instances of manifest injustice in the plan prescribed in the Ordinance, is, that it operates to exclude from the account all items of expenditure in the early years of the last century.

If the principle adopted by that Ordinance was just, why should its application be stopped in 1820?

For a number of years before that date there had been large expenditures made by Virginia in what is now West Virginia, towards which the people of that section had contributed little or nothing. For a long period after the settlement of Western Virginia, the rest of the State had practically to carry that section of the Commonwealth.

Many times as much was expended there on public account, as it contributed to the Treasury of the Commonwealth.

All that was well enough, for it was reasonably hoped that in time, with the development of the bountiful resources of that trans-mountain region and the consequent increase of its wealth, the accounts would be squared.

From the very dawn of the internal improvement policy of Virginia the dream of her leading men was the construction of some efficient line of communication between her Eastern and her Western waters.

This was earnestly advocated by Washington, and others of her representative citizens, and among these Chief Justice Marshall applied the great powers of his mind and unerring judgment in aid of a wise solution of the problem.

In 1812, at the request of the General Assembly, he devoted much of his time to arduous service as Chairman of a Commission which was created for the purpose of examining the intervening region, and ascertaining and reporting as to the best route and mode of communication between the Eastern and Western waters.

Together with other members of the Commission, the Chief Justice spent some time among the mountains and wild woods of Western Virginia, much of it then almost a trackless wilderness, in the patriotic discharge of this voluntarily accepted duty.

The report of this Commission which was evidently written by the Great Chief Justice, will be filed as an exhibit in the cause, not only as indicating the purpose and desire of Virginia at that early day to open up a highway through West Virginia, but as an interesting fact in connection with the history of the internal improvement policy of Virginia.

From 1812 down to the breaking out of the war which resulted in her dismemberment, the means and energies of the Commonwealth were largely devoted to the construction of roads, turnpikes, water-ways, and railroads, and especially to lines which were designed to develop Western Virginia.

This policy generally received the earnest support of the people of what now constitutes West Virginia, and their representatives, and very little indeed of the debt would have been contracted if they had opposed it; for there was a powerful opposition to that policy and to contracting the debt in large portions of the Eastern part of the State.

As giving some notion of the views of leading and representative citizens of Western Virginia, extracts from the message to the General Assembly, of Governor Joseph Johnson, of Harrison county, West Virginia, in January, 1852, will be printed in the appendix to this brief.

These are incontrovertible facts, to which we cannot shut our eyes, unless we would ignore the truth.

We therefore respectfully submit that these ordinances and public acts, adopted under such circumstances, should not be construed strictly against Virginia, who, without the actual consent of her people, or their representatives, was to be bound by them.

On the contrary, they should be strictly construed against West Virginia, in whose interest they were manifestly conceived and made.

That the rule embodied in the Wheeling Ordinance was not only arbitrary, and inequitable, but contrary to the usages of nations, and the principles of natural equity and public law, as enunciated by the great publicists and jurists of the world, and also as expressed by learned American authors, will be manifest from an examination of the extracts from the works and opinions of a number of these authorities which will be found in an appendix to this brief.

It will be seen that the authorities there quoted, with a single exception, all substantially agree that the rule of equity applicable to such a case is, that the common debt and common assets shall be apportioned between the two States ratably.

The only exception to this practically unbroken line of authority, is to be found in Mr. Hall's treatise on International Law. With entire deference for his ability, we respectfully submit, that the views of this learned author upon this subject are unsupported by reason or authority, and are repugnant to those principles of justice and right, from which the rules of International and Public Law derive their highest sanction.

If Mr. Hall is correct, then three-fourths, or four-fifths, of a State, could, by splitting off from the original State, escape liability for the common public debt of the unsevered Commonwealth, and leave that burden to rest exclusively upon the remaining parcel thereof.

The flagrant injustice of such a rule would be the same if it should be applied to this case, the only difference here being one, not in principle, but in degree; for, here the new S[illegible] embraced perhaps one-third of the actual, and one-half of the prospective and potential resources and wealth of the original State, instead of three-fourths, or four-fifths thereof, as in the case just assumed.

The debt was created by the whole State, bound the whole State, and should be paid by the whole State.

Its obligations rested equally upon the whole State, and upon every part of it, and should have been, and should now be, borne by every part of the undivided Commonwealth, whether each part has received its ratable share of the expenditures made out of the money for which the debt was contracted, or not. It would be exceedingly difficult, indeed impossible, to apportion the debt upon any basis which would require each county, or each section, or each grand division, to contribute to its payment in proportion to the benefits actually received by such county, section, or grand division—and no sanction for any such principle will be found in the writings of the publicists and jurists who have considered and discussed these questions.

But, if it be true, as is indicated in the Bill, and as it can and will be demonstrated to be true, that the public debt of the Commonwealth was created largely for the constuction of works of internal improvement which would develop the vast resources of Western Virginia then known to be lying there in boundless but almost useless affluence; that some of the most important and most expensive of these works would not have been undertaken, if it had not been believed that their construction would have that effect; that the policy under which and the acts by which that debt was contracted received the warm and active support of the people of the counties which now constitute the new State; that a large part of that debt was contracted by the votes of a majority of the representatives from those counties, and against the wishes and the votes of a majority of the representatives in the General Assembly from the counties constituting the present State of Virginia; and that a very small part of the debt was or could have been created had the people from the counties now forming West Virginia, and their representatives in the General Assembly opposed its creation,—if these facts which are a part of the history of the Commonwealth, be true, how could the amount of money which was expended in West Virginia be, by possibility, any just or equitable measure of the share of that debt which, in good conscience, she should assume and pay?

Yet, by the Wheeling Ordinance, that is made the chief measure for determining the proportion of the common debt which the younger Virginia should assume and pay.

Tried by every test of authority, and every standard of principle and right, the basis of settlement prescribed by the Wheeling Ordinance, was, upon its face, arbitrary, illogical, and inequitable, and yet the learned counsel for West Virginia, would, by construction, give it a meaning which would make it work even greater hardship and injustice upon Virginia, than its language fairly interpreted would justify.

Here, then, we have an Ordinance which prescribes a plan of settlement, palpably unjust and inequitable, and in contravention of both common right, and of the common public law of the civilized world.

Such an enactment clearly comes within the time-honored rule, that a statute in derogation of common right or of common law must be strictly construed—and so construed as to conform it in its operation and effect, to the principles of right and justice and of the common law, so far as this can be done without violating the manifest expressed purpose of the statute.

See this Rule as applied to Acts in derogation of the common law.

This salutary rule, especially as to statutes in contravention of common right, but also as to those in derogation of the common law, is embodied in the jurisprudence of both Virginia and West Virginia.

To the same effect are a large number of decisions of other States, a few of which are:

Webb v. Baird, 6 Ind., 13.
Sewall v. Jones, 9 Pick., 412.
Mayor of Savanah v. Hartridge, 8 Ga., 23.
Chapin v. Persse & Brooks Paper Works, 30 Conn., 461.
Phillips v. Dunkirk R. Co., 78 Pa. St., 177.

By the express terms of the 9th Section of the Wheeling Ordinance, it was provided that:

> "The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, to be ascertained," &c.

That is the paramount and controlling mandate and stipulation of the clause which prescribes the portion of the debt which the new State shall assume and pay.

Our insistence is, that the residue of the clause should be so construed as to give effect to the righteous principle thus expressly made the rule by which West Virginia's liability under it shall be determined.

The enactment should be interpreted and applied so as to to defeat that purpose, ut res magis valeat quam pereat.

And so, whenever in stating the account between the two States under the provisions of the Ordinance, a question shall arise as to whether a particular item of charge against West Virginia shall be included in the account, such construction should be given to the Ordinance as will tend to place upon the new State a just proportion of the common indebtedness, rather than a construction which will tend to exonerate West Virginia from her just and equitable share thereof.

In other words, in the application of the arbitrary basis prescribed by the Ordinance, Virginia should, according to the equitable rules of construction which are especially applicable to this case, be given the benefit of every reasonable doubt.

If the construction and effect, which, as we understand their position, opposing council advocate, be given to that Ordinance, the Act of February 3, 1863, and to Section 8 of Article VIII of the first Constitution of West Virginia, the result will be one of palpable wrong and injustice to Virginia.

The whole Wheeling Ordinance will be found printed in full in the appendix to the opening brief of counsel for Virginia, upon this motion.

Its provisions and the language in which they were formulated, were manifestly the work of intelligent and able lawyers.

It fully specifies the terms upon which Virginia authorized the formation of the new State,—terms which having been recognized as being in the nature of things fundamental, and upon the acceptance of them, and the formation of a new State under them with the sanction of Congress, they became contractual, and operated as a covenant binding both States.

As a necessary corrollary to this, there results this now self-evident truth, namely, that no additional or new term could be added to that Ordinance, without the consent of Virginia.

While it is true that the opening brief of counsel for Virginia, upon this motion, did not accept the basis prescribed by the Wheeling Ordinance as having been irrevocably fixed, as the one by which the settlement must be made, and intimated that in the event that it should turn out upon the application of that scheme of accounting to the facts of the case, that it would "lead to absolutely unconscionable results, and operate to impair the obligation of the contracts by which the common debt was created, contracts which were obligatory alike upon Virginia and West Virginia, or for any other valid reason, then the scheme of settlement indicated by the Wheeling Ordinance would have to be discarded, and an equitable basis and scheme of settlement adopted."

In other words, if the basis prescribed by the Ordinance should, when applied, produce results which would shock the moral sense of mankind, and operate a fraud upon Virginia and the common creditors of both States, then it would be right for the court to adopt some other basis.

But the statement above quoted is immediately followed by this qualifying paragraph:

> "It is due to frankness to say, that, while the Wheeling Ordinance upon its face, prescribes an absolutely arbitrary basis of settlement, the representatives of Virginia are satisfied, that upon a fair, reasonable, and just construction of the language of that ordinance, and of the subsequent supplemental enactments, the scheme of settlement therein defined will, when applied to the facts as stated in the bill, and as it is believed they can be established by proofs, result in fixing the proportion of the debt of Virginia which West Virginia should assume and pay, inclusive of interest, at a very large sum, though not so large a sum as it would be equitable for West Virginia to pay."

Farther investigation and consideration convince the representatives of Virginia and her counsel that fairly construed and applied, as we believe they must be construed and applied by a court of equity, the Ordinance and the constating Acts which constitute as much a part of the plan of settlement adopted by the two States, as does the Ordinance itself, will not lead to any such unconscionable results, as would appear to be inevitable, particularly if the Ordinance be taken by itself.

It may be that the framers of those instruments built fairer than they intended. It is pretty certain that they built fairer than they knew.

Clause III, pp. 6 to 8 of the opening brief upon this motion, succinctly and frankly states the position of the complainant in reference to the scheme of settlement which we seem to be shut up to.

The following quotation from that clause (p. 7 of opening brief):

"As was indicated by this court in its decision overruling the defendant's demurrer, the Wheeling Ordinance, and Section 8 of Article VIII of the first Constitution of > West Virginia, must be taken and read together: So also these constating acts of February 3, and 4, 1863, and particularly of February 3, 1863, must be taken and read together with Section 9 of the Wheeling Ordinance, and with Section 8 of Article VIII of the first West Virginia Constitution, as together prescribing the terms and conditions on which the consent of the Commonwealth was given to the formation of the new State out of her territory, and the transfer to that new State when formed of any portion of the assets and property of the parent State." correctly expresses the views of complainant and her counsel upon this question, as the same are stated in the Bill, in the oral arguments and printed briefs of counsel for complainant upon the questions arising upon the demurrer, and as now stated in this brief, and as, in principle at least, sanctioned by the opinion of the court upon the questions raised by the demurrer.

Various questions are suggested by the brief of the distinguished counsel for West Virginia, in respect to the meaning and effect of that Ordinance, and the basis, and principles upon which the accounts between the two States should be stated, and the settlement between them made, which questions we agree should be now determined by the court, and directions given to its Master accordingly, so far as it is practicable to do so without working injustice.

These questions will be now considered:

I.

The first of them which we ask the court now to decide is: Whether West Virginia is not justly and legally chargeable with interest?

In this connection, we must remember that the contract which we are considering was a Virginia contract.

Under the law of Virginia as repeatedly adjudicated by her highest court, the interest is incident to the obligation,—and whenever a debt is due, the debtor is bound to pay interest unless relieved from this obligation by agreement. This is, and has been the law of the Commonwealth for more than one hundred years.

In Jones v. Williams, 2 Call, 106, decided in 1799, Edmund Pendleton, who was one of the great Judges of our country, delivering the opinion of the court said:

> "Interest is allowed because it is natural justice that he who has the use of anothers money should pay interest for it."

Cited with approval in Baker v. Morris, 10 Leigh, 284, McVeigh v. Howard, 87 Va., 599, and Stuart v. Hurt, 88 Va., 343.

In Hatcher v. Lewis, 4 Randolph, 152, 157, the court laid down the rule in the following expressive language:

> "The interest follows the principal as the shadow does the substance."

In Chapman v. Shepherd, the court said:

"In contracts for the payment of money, interest is not given as damages at the discretion of the court, or jury, but as an incident to the debt, which the court has no discretion to refuse."

Chapman v. Shepherd, 24 Gratt., 377, 384.
Roberts v. Cocke, 28 Gratt., 207.
Tidball v. Shenandoah National Bank, 100 Va., 741.

"Interest is favored both by the legislative and judicial bodies of the State."

Tazewell v. Saunders, 13 Gratt., 354, 370.

In McVeigh v. Howard, the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia said: 87 Va. 599

"It is the settled rule that when no day is named in the bond or note given for the payment of a precedent debt, it is due and payable on the day of its date, and bears interest from that date, though no interest be reserved. Such an instrument like a bond or note payable, in Virginia, on demand, is payable presently, and bears interest from date. This doctrine is founded in good conscience and correct morals." * * *

Citing Jones v. Williams and Hatcher v. Lewis, quoted above.

Such is the law of Virginia as to interest.

The law of West Virginia in regard thereto is the same.

In Shipman v. Bailey, Judge Snyder, announcing the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court of Appeals of that State, after citing a number of authorities upon the question, stated the rule as follows:

> "Other authorities of the same character might be cited, but, we think, we have given sufficient to establish the rule, which seems to be, that in contracts for the payment of money interest on the principal sum is a legal incident of the debt and a part of the contract, and wherever there is a contract for the payment of a specified legal rate of interest, whether such rate is fixed by the contract itself or by the law of the place where the contract is made, the obligation of the contract extends to the payment of such interest as fully as it does to the principal sum, and courts have no more power to change the rate of interest thus fixed, than they have to dispense with the enforcement of the contract either in whole or in part."

Shipman v. Bailey, 20 W. Va., 140, 146.

That decision reaffirms another proposition, applicable to this case, already a part of the jurisprudence of West Virginia, by the adjudications of the Supreme Court of Virginia rendered before the birth of the new State, namely, that the lex loci contractus controls in the matter of the interest chargeable against a debtor.

In Pickens v. McCoy, the court affirms Shipman v. Bailey, and adopts the language just quoted from that decision. 24 West Va., 344-352.

Independently of these West Virginia decisions, such parts of the common law, and of the laws of the State of Virginia as were in force on the 20th of June, 1863, when the first Constitution of West Virginia went into operation, and as are not repugnant to said Constitution, were continued and declared to be the law of West Virginia. Section 8 of Article XI of the first West Virginia Constitution.

The effect of this provision was to adopt for the new State the body of the common and statute laws of the Commonwealth, so far as the same were in force within the boundaries of the new State on the 20th of June, 1863.

As part of this body of laws, the law of Virginia as to interest became, and has continued to be, a part of the laws of West Virginia.

Such, then, was the law of Virginia before, at the time of and since the formation of West Virginia, as to the legal and equitable liability of a debtor or contractor to pay interest. Such has been the law of West Virginia since the hour of her birth. And such was, and is, the law of the contract evidenced by the public Acts of Virginia and West Virginia set forth in complainant's Bill.

The framers of the Wheeling Ordinance must be presumed to have drawn that instrument with reference to the principle of equity and justice which had then and long before that time been embodied in the laws of Virginia by the repeated decisions of her highest court.

To Virginia lawyers of that day, as since that time, Judge Coalter's apt formula of the doctrine that, "the interest follows the principal as the shadow does the substance," was as familiar as any other accepted rule of equity or of law.

Under the law of Virginia in force at the time of these transactions, interest upon the portion of the debt which West Virginia was to take upon herself, was an essential incident of the debt, and its payment as much a part of the obligation as was the payment of the principal.

But, even if the lex loci contractus had not brought us to this conclusion, the language of the ordinance itself, fairly construed, leads to the same result.

That language is that:

> "The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861," &c.

Now, that debt was an interest bearing debt. It was represented by obligations of the undivided State, some of them payable at a future day, some of them at a future day and thereafter at the pleasure of the Commonwealth, but all of them interest bearing obligations, obligations in which the payment of the stipulated interest was made as much a part of the debt as was the payment of the principal.

The interest was as much a part of the debt as was the principal, and as many of the bonds were payable thirty-four years after date, and some of them at the pleasure of Virginia with interest from date, the interest as to much of the debt constituted much the greater part of it.

It was the manifest intention of the enactors of that Ordinance, unless we are to ascribe to them the sinister purpose of perpetrating flagrant wrong and injustice upon Virginia, that the new State should take upon itself, and relieve what remained of the old State of a part of the burden of debt which rested upon both States. They knew that that burden consisted as well of interest, as principal, and as much, or more, of interest than of principal.

It was not proposed that the new State should, as soon as she became a State, pay in cash a sum to be ascertained in the manner indicated in the Ordinance. The framers of the Ordinance understood too well that, under the conditions then existing, it would be impossible for the new State to raise and pay any considerable sum in cash.

Why, the new State was dependent upon the old State for the money necessary to enable her to begin business, and she did not have, and in the nature of things could not command, a sufficient amount in cash to pay off one-fifth or even one-tenth of the then Virginia debt.

The stipulation was not that the new State should pay a sum in cash on account of its share of the common indebtedness; but that it should take upon itself a just proportion of that debt, to be ascertained as in the Ordinance prescribed.

Are we to understand that a court of conscience is to be asked to construe that stipulation to mean that the new State shall take upon itself only a proportion of a part of that debt? That it shall assume a share of the principal only of the debt, but shall be exonerated from any part of the interest which was, and is, as integral a part of the Virginia debt, and of the obligations which represent it, as the branches are a part of the tree from whose trunk they spring?

In their very elaborate reply brief upon this motion, opposing counsel devote very little attention to this important question, although it was plainly in their minds when they prepared their draft of decree, and although their attention was challenged to it by the opening brief for Virginia. There is some discussion of the question at pp. 35 to 37 of their brief, but that discussion ignores the facts and the principles upon which West Virginia's legal, "equitable," and "just" obligation to assume and pay the interest as well as the principal of her share of the debt, rests.

But West Virginia's equitable and legal liability to pay interest upon her share of the debt of Virginia does not depend alone upon the Wheeling Ordinance, or upon the law of Virginia and of West Virginia which makes the interest an essential part of a debt; but it rests also upon the express terms of the Constitution under which West Virginia became a State.

Now, by the Act of the Virginia Legislature at Wheeling, of May 13, 1862, the validity of which we no longer question, for reasons hereinbefore stated, Virginia gave her consent to the formation of the new State out of her territory, "under the provisions set forth in the Constitution for said State of West Virginia and the schedule thereto annexed, proposed by the Convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 26th day November, 1861."

It is true that this consent was predicated upon West Virginia's being erected into a State under the provisions of that identical Constitution, without the performance of which condition that consent was abortive and ineffectual.

The fact is, that at the behest of Congress, that Constitution was subsequently amended in a material particular, which change, unless objection thereto had been waived, or the change assented to by the Legislature of Virginia, would have rendered the previous conditional consent null and void.

But since the opening brief upon this motion was filed the counsel for Virginia who writes this brief, has discovered the following joint resolution, which it seems was adopted by the Legislature of Virginia at Wheeling, on the 9th of December, 1862:

> "No. 2. Joint Resolution requesting the House of Representatives of the United States to take up and pass without amendment, the bill for the admission of the State of West Virginia, passed by the United States Senate on the 10th of July last.
>
> Passed December 9, 1862.
>
> Resolved, That feeling the greatest anxiety and interest in the successful issue of the movement for a new State in West Virginia, we earnestly request the House of Representatives of the United States to take up and pass, without alteration or amendments, the bill which passed the Senate of the United States on the 10th of July last."

See "Constitution and Statutes Va. & West Va., 1861-66."

This resolution was telegraphed to Washington on the evening of the day on which it was passed. History of West Virginia by Lewis, p. 389.

The Senate Bill referred to in the resolution was taken up in the House of Representatives, and passed on the 10th of December, and was approved by President Lincoln and became a law on the 31st of December, 1862, in the very form in which the Legislature of Virginia had by its Joint Resolution of the 9th of December, 1862, requested and urged that it should be passed.

This Act of Congress to which the Legislature of Virginia had thus given its assent, made it a condition of the admission of the new State into the Union, that its proposed Constitution should be amended in the particular in which it was afterwards amended by the Convention and people of West Virginia, in regard to the emancipation of slaves.

The effect of said Joint Resolution, was, under these circumstances, to waive any objection by the Legislature of Virginia to the amendment made to the Constitution of West Virginia at the instance of Congress, and to make the consent given by the Act of May 13, 1862, effective, notwithstanding that amendment.

What, then, was the effect of the admission of West Virginia to the Union under the consent thus given, and the Constitution upon which that consent was predicated?

It will not be denied that the condition upon which the consent of the Legislature of Virginia was given to the formation of West Virginia and her admission into the Union as a State, was, that she should become a State under the provisions of the Constitution under which her statehood was sanctioned by Congress.

Among the most important of those provisions, so far as Virginia was concerned, were those expressed in Article VIII of that Constitution in reference to the public debt.

Section 8 of that Article reads as follows:

> "8. An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State, and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

We have a right to assert that, unless West Virginia had been required to assume and pay an equitable proportion of the Virginia debt in manner and form as was expressly prescribed in this Section, the consent of the Legislature of Virginia would never have been given to the creation of the new State.

These were, therefore, fundamental conditions of West Virginia's existence.

By accepting these conditions, the new State became bound in equity and in law to perform them in good faith.

Upon grounds which have been already indicated, as sufficient and controlling we are constrained to concede that Section 8 of Article VIII of the first West Virginia Constitution, and Section 9 of the Wheeling Ordinance being in pari materia, must be read together, and that the proportion of the debt which the new State was required by this provision of her Constitution to assume, was to be ascertained in the manner prescribed by the Ordinance.

But the Constitution goes farther, and expressly provides as to the equitable proportion of the debt which West Virginia should assume, that her Legislature should "provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

This was precisely in accordance with the plan which had long theretofore been adopted by the Commonwealth for the payment of her debt.

This plan was embodied not only in the statutes, but also in the Constitution of Virginia in force when West Virginia, became a State.

It was embodied in that Constitution in the following terms:

> "29. There shall be set apart annually, from the accruing revenues, a sum equal to seven per cent. of the State debt existing on the first day of January in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two. The fund thus set apart shall be called the sinking fund, and shall be applied to the payment of the interest of the State debt, and the principal of such part as may be redeemable. If no part be redeemable, then the residue of the sinking fund, after the payment of such interest, shall be invested in the bonds or certificates of debt of this Commonwealth, or of the United States, or of some of the States of this Union, and applied to the payment of the State debt as it shall become redeemable. Whenever, after the said first day of January, a debt shall be contracted by the Commonwealth, there shall be set apart in like manner, annually, for thirty-four years, a sum exceeding by one per cent. the aggregate amount of the annual interest agreed to be paid thereon at the time of its contraction; which sum shall be part of the sinking fund, and shall be applied in the manner before directed. The General Assembly shall not otherwise appropriate any part of the sinking fund or its accruing interest, except in time of war, insurrection or invasion."

Section 29 of the Constitution of Virginia, in force from January 1, 1852, Code of Virginia for 1860, p. 47.

It was expressed in a concrete form and given further effect by the second Section of the following Act passed by the General Assembly of Virginia:

"Chap. 17.—An Act establishing a sinking fund and providing for the payment of the semi-annual interest on and redemption of the public debt.

Passed March 26, 1853.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

"2. Whenever after the said first day of January, eighteen hundred and fifty-two, a debt shall be contracted by the Commonwealth, there shall be set apart, in like manner, annually for thirty-four years, a sum exceeding by one per cent. the aggregate amount of the annual interest agreed to be paid thereon at the time of its contraction, which sum shall be part of the sinking fund, and shall be applied in the manner hereinbefore directed."

Its effect was, therefore, well understood to be to conform the undertaking of West Virginia in regard to the time and manner of the payment of her share of the debt to the plan and scheme of payment which had been adopted by the Commonwealth, and which experience had approved.

That scheme was the creation from the annual revenues of the State, of a fund equivalent to seven per centum of the principal of the debt. Of this, six per centum went to pay the annually accruing interest, and one per centum was invested and set apart to retire the principal sum due, within thirty-four years, and this arrangement was defined as a sinking fund.

It was found, and if the calculation is made it will be shown to be true, that one per centum of any sum invested and compounded at six per centum interest per annum, will in thirty-four years produce an amount equal to such sum.

This was the theory and the plan which Virginia had adopted for the liquidation of her debt.

It was a plan with which Messrs. Willey, Van Winkle, Hall, Brown, Haymond, and other members of the first West Virginia Convention, who had been previously members and some of them able members of the General Assembly of Virginia, were doubtless entirely familiar: And it is the same plan which we find incorporated in the scheme of settlement which constitutes a part of the foundation upon which West Virginia's existence as a State rests.

By this clause of West Virginia's Constitution, therefore, it was required, not that the new State should pay a lump sum in cash, to be ascertained in the manner prescribed, but that she should assume "an equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth" existing on the 31st of December, 1860, and should "provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years."

The framers of the West Virginia Constitution thus manifestly adopted, and engrafted upon that instrument, the plan which for nine years or more had been a part of the organic and statutory law of Virginia for the extinguishment of her public debt, and the Legislature of Virginia accepted and approved that plan.

That plan included, (as the West Virginia Constitution also expressly included), an undertaking on the part of the Commonwealth to pay the accruing interest, and to liquidate or reredeem the principal of each bond representing the debt, within thirty-four years.

(This statement is subject to this qualification, that as to a considerable portion of the debt, particularly that contracted prior to 1852, like English consols, the principal was redeemable at the pleasure of Virginia).

In simple language, the stipulation of West Virginia expressed in her Constitution, and accepted and acted upon by Virginia, was, that West Virginia would pay the accruing interest on her share of the debt, as it should accrue, and the principal thereof within thirty-four years.

That such was her express undertaking, appears from the language of her first Constitution, interpreted according to the reasonable and natural meaning of that language.

That such was the purpose, meaning, and effect of that language, is conclusively shown when we read it in the light of the plan established by the Constitution and statute of Virginia, then in force, for the establishment of a sinking fund for the liquidation of her public debt, which plan was adopted by the new State as to its share of that debt.

And so, we find that both by the express terms of the Wheeling Ordinance fairly construed, and by the express terms of the Constitution under which Virginia and the National Congress consented that West Virginia should become a State, this new State has become expressly obligated to pay interest upon the share of the principal of the common public debt for which she is liable. U. S. v. N. Carolina 136 U. S. 211

Another question which arises in connection with the consideration of this subject, is, from what time is West Virginia justly and equitably bound to pay that interest?

Answer to this is furnished by the Wheeling Ordinance and by the Section of the first West Virginia Constitution above quoted.

The settlement by the terms of both instruments was to be made as of the arbitrary date of January 1, 1861, or to be precisely accurate, as of December 31, 1860. That, accordingly, is the date from which fairly, equitably, and legally, (because it accords with the express terms of both the Ordinance and the Constitution) the interest should be computed.

As already shown, the debt, a proportion of which as of that date, West Virginia was to assume and pay, was an interest bearing debt, and the interest was as integral a part of it as was the principal.

A farther kindred inquiry to the last is: To what time should West Virginia be required to pay such interest?

Our response to this is, that she is justly, equitably, and legally bound to pay this interest,

(1) By the terms of the Wheeling Ordinance, certainly, for the period during which the debt of the Commonwealth existing on the 31st of December, 1860, would continue to be an interest bearing debt: And we have seen that that was not only until the obligations representing the debt became due, but under the just rule of the law of Virginia as to interest, in force during the whole period of the creation of the debt, until that principal should be fully paid.

(2) By the terms of the Section of her Constitution above quoted, West Virginia undertook that her Legislature should assume and pay the accruing interest and the principal of her share of that debt in thirty-four years.

Her Legislature has failed either to assume, or to pay that share, or any part of it.

The interest accruing thereon from December 31, 1860, has continued to accrue, as to her, until it now amounts to vastly more than the principal. It was that interest which West Virginia agreed to pay, and it was that principal for the payment of which West Virginia's Legislature was to make provision, so that the same should be paid within thirty-four years.

We are unwilling to anticipate that the learned and fair-minded counsel for the defendant will argue that West Virginia, by the language of that provision of her Constitution, is only bound to pay interest for thirty-four years from December 31, 1860, or from June 20, 1863, because we are unwilling to assume that our distinguished opponents would contend that a State, any more than an individual, should be allowed to take advantage of her own wrong, or profit by her own procrastination, and neglect of duty.

Here, West Virginia has not only not taken upon herself a just, or any other proportion of the common public debt, nor provided for the payment of the accruing interest thereon, and for the payment of the principal, but she has persistently failed and refused to do either of these things, and has by the votes of her Legislature, repeatedly repudiated any and all liability whatever for any part of that indebtedness.

(See Resolutions of Legislature of West Virginia in Appendix).

With all deference for the distinguished counsel for the defendant, we venture to believe that a court of equity will not allow any defendant, and particularly a State, which should be an exemplar of fair and honorable dealing in all of its transactions, to make gain out of its own palpable dereliction of duty.

And so, our response to such contention, if it shall be urged is, that equity will not suffer any party to take advantage of his own wrong.

Here, fortunately for West Virginia, it will, by reason of her increased wealth and prosperity, be far easier for her to pay the principal and the accumulated interest now, than it would have been to have paid the interest annually as it accrued, and the principal thirty-four years from 1861, or 1863. West Virginia could pay thirty million of dollars now, with as little inconvenience as she could have paid three or four millions thirty-five or forty years ago.

If there ever was a case to which the benign doctrine of Virginia law, that "interest follows the principal as the shadow does the substance," should be applied; we seem to have such a case here.

Nor is there any extravagance in the language of our opening brief upon this motion, when we say that,

> "any settlement which does not require that State to pay interest during the long period of her default and refusal to pay anything, would be not only unjust and inequitable, but iniquitous."

II.

The Wheeling Ordinance provides; that in ascertaining the just proportion of the debt which the new State shall take upon itself, it shall be charged with;

> "all the State expenditures within the limits thereof, and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of said debt was contracted, and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included in said new State during said period."

There cannot well be any question as to what will be included in the first item of the debit charge against the new State It includes all expenditures of whatever kind made by Virginia in any part of the territory embraced in the new State, since any part of the debt was contracted. There will be no controversy as to the earliest date when any part of the debt existing on the 31st of December, 1860, was contracted.

Part of the debt, then unpaid, was created as far back as 1820. So, the period covered by the account will be from, say, January 1, 1820.

There is likely to be some question as to what shall be regarded as under the circumstances, a just proportion of the ordinary expenses to be charged to West Virginia.

As to the criterion on which the apportionment of the expenses of government should be made, if that is to be the population, we respectfully submit that in this case it should be the free populations—the citizenship—and not the total of the free and the slave population. The care and policing of the slaves cost the State little or nothing. Those matters were regulated by their masters on the plantations. Of course, none of them could vote; but upon the "mixed basis" of representation which was partially adopted in Virginia, they counted to some extent in fixing the basis of representation in the General Assembly; that is, five negroes counted as much as three white men, where the mixed basis prevailed.

The debt was contracted solely by the votes of the white population or their representatives. It was expended by them or under laws of their enactment. The taxes were levied exclusively upon the property of the free population; and the revenues were appropriated and expended as they directed, and exclusively for their benefit.

The negroes did not constitute a part of the citizenship of the State during any part of the period when the debt was contracted, or the money realized from it was expended; nor were they any part of the body politic.

Under these circumstances we would submit as a just criterion for such apportionment the white population of the territory embraced in West Virginia, and of the territory still remaining to the Commonwealth, at the times when the expenditures to be apportioned were made.

However, there is not probably, as yet, enough in the record to enable the court to decide this question intelligently; or satisfactorily.

III.

Another and quite an important question which can probably be fairly considered and decided, upon what is now in the record, and which should be decided now, if a just conclusion about it can be reached at this time; is, whether West Virginia shall be charged, in the settlement to be made, with the property or assets which she has received from the Commonwealth?

The Act of the Virginia Legislature at Wheeling, of February 3, 1863, which is printed in the appendix to the opening brief for Virginia on this motion, expressly provides that "the new State shall duly account for the same in the settlement hereafter to be made with this State." See Section 5 of the Act of February 3, 1863.

Counsel for West Virginia deny that these important items shall be brought into the account; and in order to have any ground on which to base their objection, they contend that the Acts of February 3 and 4, 1863, were not binding upon West Virginia; that her rights were determined by the Wheeling Ordinance, and by the provisions of her first Constitution, and by the Act of May 13, 1862, of the Virginia Legislature at Wheeling, and the Act of Congress approved December 31, 1862, giving the consent of the Congress to the formation of the new State and her admission to the Union; that these Acts were all effective, and the rights of the new State definitely determined by them before the Acts of February, 1863, were passed; and that those Acts of the Virginia Legislature of February 3 and 4, 1863, were not binding upon West Virginia, and imposed no obligation upon her, because she had already, by reason of the consent given by Virginia to her statehood, been absolutely vested with the very rights which the Act of February 3rd, undertook to confer upon her upon conditions.

The answer to this argument, vigorously and ably as it is presented, is complete.

The position of the counsel for the defendant upon this point would find support in the doctrine laid down by Mr. Hall, if there had been no agreement between Virginia and West Virginia as to the terms upon which the partition of the old State should be made, and the debt thereafter apportioned between the two States; but neither Mr. Hall, nor any other authority will be found to sanction the proposition, that, where a new State has been erected out of the territory of the old State by treaty or by a convention between the mother State and the new State any such doctrine applies.

The rule in that case logically, and necessarily is, and must be, that where the two States have undertaken to define and prescribe the terms upon which the new State shall be created, the rights and obligations of the two States will thereafter be determined absolutely by the stipulations and provisions of such treaty or convention.

The elementary rule of universal application, that a party will not be allowed to add to, or to take from, the terms of a valid written instrument applies with intensified force to a compact between two sovereign States.

The Wheeling Ordinance, which taken together with the first Constitution of the State of West Virginia; the Act of the Virginia Legislature at Wheeling, of May 13, 1862, giving the consent of the Legislature of Virginia to the formation of the new State under the provisions of that Constitution, and the Act of Congress approved December 31, 1862, giving the consent of Congress to the creation of the new State and to her admission into the Union, constitute a compact; and to this compact no new term can be added, and no term prescribed therein can be taken away.

Now, the Wheeling Ordinance, and the article of the Constitution of West Virginia referred to, are absolutely silent upon the subject of the property and assets of the Commonwealth of Virginia. While the Wheeling Ordinance, with the greatest particularity, undertakes to prescribe and define minutely the terms upon which the new State shall be created, its boundaries, and the rights of property of individuals residing therein, it makes no provision whatever in respect to property held by Virginia in her corporate capacity, whether it be personal or real. As a necessary effect of the terms of that Ordinance, the title and ownership to that property remained, after its enactment, and after the formation of the new State of West Virginia, just where they were vested before the Ordinance was enacted; and that is, in the Commonwealth of Virginia.

As already indicated no new term can be incorporated in, or added to, that Ordinance, without the consent of Virginia; and yet, the learned counsel for the defendant would have the court, by a forced construction to interpolate a new term into this Ordinance which was, as we have a right to assume, intentionally excluded from it by the parties who framed it.

If there is any contract or covenant to which the doctrine of expressio unius est exclusio alterius ought to apply, it is to a compact like this between States, ~~and~~ affecting the rights of the people of those States for all coming time.

The men who framed the Wheeling Ordinance and the Constitution of West Virginia among whom were evidently lawyers of a higher order of ability, intelligence, and learning, must have fully realized the meaning and effect of the Wheeling Ordinance, and must have known that it did not transfer to the new State any title or ownership in respect to any of the property and assets which Virginia owned in her corporate capacity; for we find that they, or some of them, were instrumental in the enactment of the Act of February 3, 1863, which undertook to cure this omission, which was doubtless an intentional omission, and to vest in the new State the property and assets of Virginia, the situs of which was within the limits of the new State, upon the just and equitable terms that the new State should account ~~in that settlement~~ for the value of all such property, in the settlement to be made between the two States.

The only settlement to be made between the two States, was the settlement in regard to the public debt; and the purpose of the Act of February 3, 1863, was to provide that the new State should account without settlement for the value of the assets and property which she should acquire from Virginia under that Act.

The Legislature of Virginia at Wheeling had the right to exercise supreme dominion over the territory and people of West Virginia at the time that the Act of February 3, 1863, was passed; subject only to the limitations of the Constitutions of Virginia, and of the United States; so that the Act of February 3, 1863, was clearly within the competency of the Legislature of Virginia to enact; nor can we be blind to the fact that the portion of the territory of Virginia which was represented by Senators and Delegates in the Legislature at Wheeling, was practically coincident with the territory of the proposed new State of West Virginia; so that it was in fact the representatives of the people who were about to form themselves into the State of West Virginia, who enacted the Act of February 3, 1863.

Upon these grounds, we can fairly claim that the Act of February 3, 1863, was a valid law, and binding upon the people who afterwards constituted the State of West Virginia.

But that Act has still farther sanctions which make it absolutely binding upon the people of West Virginia.

The 8th Section of Article XI of the first Constitution of West Virginia is as follows:

> "8. Such parts of the common law and of the laws of the State of Virginia as are in force within the boundaries of the State of West Virginia, when this Constitution goes into operation; and are not repugnant thereto, shall be and continue the law of this State until altered or repealed by the Legislature." * * *
>
> Article XI, Section 8, 1st West Virginia Constitution; effective June 20, 1863.

We respectfully insist that the effect of this provision of the Constitution was to sanction and continue in force the Acts of February 3 and 4, 1863, both of which were in force within the boundaries of the State of West Virginia at the time that that Constitution went into operation.

But this Act of February 3, 1863, has received still farther and express sanction and acceptance by a positive enactment of the Legislature of West Virginia. Section 8 of the Act of the Legislature of West Virginia, approved December 20, 1875, Acts of the Legislature of West Virginia, Session of 1875, p. 126, is as follows:

> "8. The Auditor shall institute all the necessary and appropriate measures for the collection of all claims for taxes and other demands transferred by the Commonwealth of Virginia to this State by an act of the General Assembly of said Commonwealth entitled 'an act transferring to the proposed State of West Virginia, when the same shall become one of the United States, all the State's interest in property; unpaid and uncollected taxes, fines; forfeitures, penalties and judgments in counties embraced within the boundaries of the proposed State aforesaid;' passed on the third day of February, 1863."

And therefore, we respectfully, but earnestly, claim that West Virginia is equitably, legally, and justly, bound to account for all property and assets, whether real or personal, which she has received from the Commonwealth of Virginia; in the settlement which it is the object of this suit to bring about.

There is, we think, enough in the record to show that no equitable settlement can be made between the two States upon the basis of the Wheeling Ordinance and the constating Acts referred to, unless there shall be brought into the account with West Virginia a fair charge against her for such assets, money, or property as she has received under the Acts of February 3 and 4, 1863, and upon the fullest examination and consideration which we have been able to give to the subject, we are satisfied that even then the amount with which West Virginia will be chargeable on account of the public debt of the undivided State, will be far less than she ought to have assumed and paid if we have reference to all of the facts, and all of the equities of the case.

It is proper to state here that in so far as any property or money which West Virginia acquired from Virginia, either under the Acts of February 3 and 4, 1863, or otherwise, was property which was acquired by Virginia by the expenditure of money within the limits of the State of West Virginia, or money paid by Virginia, after 1819, the new State will, of course, be chargeable with the amount so expended or paid by the Commonwealth, under the Wheeling Ordinance, and not under the Act of February 3, 1863, in the settlement to be made between the two States, for the Wheeling Ordinance provides that the new State shall be charged with all expenditures made within its limits by the Commonwealth of Virginia, since any part of the debt was contracted.

Counsel for Virginia will file a modified draft of decree in conformity with the views presented in this brief; which we will respectfully ask the court to consider, and to enter, if they shall approve the same.

Respectfully submitted

WILLIAM A. ANDERSON,
Attorney General and as such Counsel for Virginia.

APPENDIX No. 1.

To Reply Brief for Complainant on motion for order of reference in Virginia v. West Virginia.

The doctrine of the apportionment of the public debt of a State, which is divided into two or more States.

Grotius states the principle as follows:

> "On the other hand it may happen that what has been one State, is divided, either by mutual consent or by hostile force, as the body of the Persian Empire was divided among the successors of Alexander.. When this transpires, several sovereignties exist instead of one, each with its own rights; but if anything had been in common; that ought either to be administered in common, or divided in portions pro rata."
>
> Grotius' Book II; Chapter 9; Section 8.

And Puffendorf says:

> "Where a kingdom divides by common consent into two or more distinct Commonwealths, the public patrimony with all the debts and incumbrances upon them, ought to be equally shared among them. Tho' indeed when such separations are made by mutual agreement, there is commonly express provision made for such cases."
>
> Puffendorf's Law of Nature & Nations, Book VIII, Chapter 12; Section 5.

Chancellor Kent thus concisely states the doctrine:

> "If a State should be divided in respect to territory, its rights and obligations are not impaired, and if they have not been apportioned by special agreement, those rights are to be enjoyed; and those obligations fulfilled, by all the parts in common."
>
> 1 Kent's Comm. pp. 25-26.

Phillimore thus clearly states the rule:

> "If a nation be divided into various distinct societies, the obligations which had accrued to the whole before division, are, unless they have been the subject of a special agreement, ratably binding upon the different parts."
>
> 1 Phillimore International Law, Part II, Chapter 137, M. p. 158.

Pomeroy expresses the rule in the identical language of Mr. Phillimore.

Pomeroy's International Law, Section 74.

Mr. Dana expresses himself as to one phase of the doctrine as follows:

> "In the separations and re-arrangments of nations in Europe, special provisions are usually made for the payment of public debts; and the principle seems admitted; that, in case of a division of a State, each new State is bound for the whole debt contracted by the former; and; in the case of a union of States; it seems equally clear that, as the whole must defend the part in war which is the international process of attachment it must practically pay the debt, although the foreign power may look only to the people and land of the State which made the contract. The formation of the new State so alters the nature of all the securities the creditor looked to; that the new State has a general obligation to see that he does not suffer by the change.

See Article 13 of treaty of 1839 for the separation of Belgium; and the treaty of Zurich, ceding Lombardy to Sardinia."

Wheaton's Int. L.—Edited, with notes, by Richard Henry Dana, Section 30, Note 18.

Mr. Halleck, after stating the effect of the dismemberment of a State by the loss of a portion of its territory by foreign conquest, or by the revolt and separation of a province, says:

"§27. The case is slightly different where one state is divided into two or more distinct and independent sovereignties. In that case, the obligations which had accrued to the whole, before the division are, (unless they have been the subject of a special agreement), ratably binding upon the different parts. This principle is established by the concurrent opinions of text-writers; the decisions of courts, and the practice of nations. It was incorporated into the treaty by which the modern kingdom of Belgium was established."

Halleck's International Law & Laws of War; Section 27.

Mr. John Bassett Moore thus states the doctrine:

> "In the event of a State being divided into two or more independent sovereignties, the obligations which had accrued to the whole before the division are ratably binding on the different parts; for as Story says, 'the division of an Empire creates no forfeiture of previous vested rights of property.'"
>
> 1 Moore's Digest Int. L. p. 334, citing > Abdy's Kent, p. 96, and > Lawrence's Wheaton, 52 (m) 20.

A number of precedents are cited by Mr. Moore in Vol. I, Section 97, pp. 339-365, of his Digest of International Law, giving the terms upon which public debts of States have been divided and apportioned, by conventions, or treaties, between the States affected, in cases where there has been a division of territory by war, conquest; or treaty.

No sanction for the rule prescribed in the Wheeling Ordinance will be found in any of the adjustments of public debts, there recorded by the learned author.

Judge Story declared the following fundamental truth:

> "It has been asserted as a principle of the common law, that the division of an empire creates no forfeiture of previously vested rights of property.
>
> And this principle is equally consonant with the common sense of mankind and the maxims of eternal justice."
>
> Mr. Justice Story in Terrett and others v. Taylor and others, 9 Cranch, 43; 50, citing Kelly v. Harrison, 2 Johnson, c. 29, Jackson v. Lunn; 3 Johnson, c. 109.

In Hartman v. Greenhow, 102 U. S. 672-677, Mr. Justice Field states the rule of international law in the following language:

> "Writers on public law speak of the principle as well established, that where a State is divided into two or more States, in the adjustment of liabilities between each other, the debts of the parent State should be ratably apportioned among them. On this subject Kent says: 'If a State should be divided in respect to territory, its rights and obligations are not impaired; and if they have not been apportioned by special agreement, their rights are to be enjoyed and their obligations fulfilled by all the parts in common.' 1 Com., 26. And Halleck, speaking of a State divided into two or more distinct and independent sovereignties says: 'In that case, the obligations which have accrued to the whole before the division are, unless they have been the subject of a special agreement, ratably binding upon the different parts. This principle is established by the concurrent opinions of text writers; the decisions of courts, and the practice of nations.'" Interna. L., ch. 3, section 27."

And this language was again approved by Mr. Justice Field in his dissenting opinion in Antoni v. Greenhow, (in which opinion Mr. Justice Harlan concurred), 107 U. S. 769-7, where the following language is used:

> "It is a well settled doctrine of public law, that, upon a division of a State into two or more States, her debts shall be ratably apportioned among them. See authorities upon this subject in Hartman v. Greenhow, 102 U. S., 677."

The only dissent from the principles thus enunciated by this long line of authorities by any author whose opinions would carry any weight upon such a subject, which we have been able to discover, is to be found in the dogma of Mr. Hall; in his work on International Law, where that learned author says:

"§27. When a new State splits off from one already existing, it necessarily steps into the enjoyment of all rights which are conferred upon it by international law in virtue of its existence as an international person, and it becomes subject to all obligations which are imposed upon it in the same way. No question therefore presents itself with respect to the general rights and duties of a new State. What, however, is its relation to the contract obligations of the State from which it has been separated; to property belonging to and privileges enjoyed by the latter, and to property belonging in common, before the occurrence of the separation, to subjects of the original state in virtue of their status as such, when some of them after the separation become subjects of the new State?

The fact of the personality of a state is the key to the answer. With rights which have been acquired, and obligations which have been contracted, by the old State as personal rights and obligations the new State has nothing to do. The old State is not extinct, it is still there to ful- The new State, on the other hand, is an entirely fresh be- fill its contract duties, and to enjoy its contract rights. ing. It neither is, nor does it represent, the person with whom other States have contracted, they may have no reason for giving it the advantages which have been accorded to the person with whom the contract was made: and it would be unjust to saddle it with liabilities which it would not have accepted on its own account. What is true as between the new State and foreign powers, is true also as between it and the old State. From the moment of independence all trace of the joint life is gone. Apart from special agreement no survival of it is possible, and the two States are merely two beings possessing no other claims on one another than those which are conferred by the bare provisions of international law. And as the old State continues its life uninterruptedly, it possesses everything belonging to it as a person, which it has not expressly lost, so that property, and advantages secured to it by treaty, which are enjoyed by it as a personal whole, or by its subjects in virtue of their being members of that whole, continue to belong to it. On the other hand, rights possessed in respect of the lost territory, including rights under treaties relating to cessions of territory and demarcations of boundary, obligations contracted with reference to it alone, and property which is within it, and which has therefore a local character, or which, though not within it, belongs to State institutions localized there, transfer themselves to the new State person. Conversely, of course, the old State person remains in sole enjoyment of its separate territory, and of all local rights connected with it.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

Property which becomes transferred by the fact of separation consists in domains, public buildings, museums and art collections, communal lands, charitable and other endowments connected with the State, and the like. When a portion of the lands belonging to a commune or to an endowment lies without the boundary of the new State it is only considered that a right to the value of the property is transferred. Convenience may dictate expropriation from the property itself; and it is only then necessary to pay its full value by way of compensation."

Hall's International Law, Sec. 27.

The fallacy of the positions taken by this learned author will be manifest when we reflect, that, if the Wheeling Conventions and Legislatures had chosen to annex, and had annexed fifty or sixty other counties to the new State, so that it would have embraced more than two thirds of the population and territory and actual and potential wealth, public properties, assets and resources of the undivided Commonwealth, the new State would have taken a good title to all of those assets, properties, and resources, free and discharged from any liability whatever for any part of the antecedent public debt of the Commonwealth, if the ordinances and other public acts of the Wheeling Conventions and Legislatures had omitted to impose any obligation upon the new State to assume and pay any part of that public debt.

Such a result would shock the moral sense of mankind; and yet, it would be no more unjust and inequitable than that which would confront us here, if the views of this eminent author are correct, had the Wheeling Conventions and Legislatures failed to prescribe any stipulations, provisions, or conditions as to the apportionment of the antecedent common public debt between the two States.

TO REPLY BRIEF FOR COMPLAINANT ON MOTION FOR ORDER OF REFERENCE IN VIRGINIA V. WEST VIRGINIA.

Extracts from message of Joseph Johnson, of Harrison, Governor of Virginia, to the General Assembly of Virginia, January 12, 1852. See Journal, House of Delegates, 1852, pp. 18-19.

"The subject of internal improvement, which for many years has engaged the anxious attention of our people, is rapidly increasing in interest and importance, and will require your most serious and careful consideration. Whether we look to the vast amount of capital already invested by the State in the enterprise, or the appropriations yet required to carry out successfully the schemes already begun, and thereby make them available for revenue and State purposes—or consider the magnitude of the objects sought to be obtained, and the importance of the results anticipated from their completion in the aid they will give in developing the mineral and agricultural resources and the manufacturing and commercial advantages of our State—all will see and be forced to acknowledge the importance of the subject, and the great and growing necessity for energetic and yet judicious action on your part in relation to it. Indeed the works of internal improvement already commenced and in course of construction, and upon which large sums of both public and private means have been expended, are so intimately connected with all the leading interests of the Commonwealth, that every year's delay in their completion will necessarily postpone, at a common loss to the whole people, great and incalculable blessings, and for an equal period of time defer to the State treasury that repletion which the heavy appropriations heretofore made for internal improvement purposes so earnestly demand, and which their final completion cannot fail to effect. Many of our sister States, with less capacity for such enterprises, and possessing natural resources and advantages far inferior to our own, have, under circumstances of great embarrassment, executed works of internal improvement which would do honor to the enterprise of independent nations. Nor have they been disappointed in the individual or State benefit which their works were expected to impart. The citizens of those States feel the superiority of this improved condition of their country, and duly appreciate the increased comforts derived from it.

"If our generous and noble old Commonwealth has been tardy in the execution of those improvements most clearly indicated by the geological structure of the country, and in a proper development of her great physical resources, it is gratifying to consider, that profiting by the example of others, she may gain much of the loss in time, by wise, prompt and energetic measures hereafter."

Then, after recommending the completion of the James River & Kanawha Canal to Clifton Forge, Governor Johnson says:

"From this point I most earnestly recommend the construction of a railroad, on State account, to some point on the Ohio river deemed most eligible upon a full reconnoissance of the several routes heretofore contemplated, having in view the valuable trade of that river and ultimately a railroad connection with the cities of Cincinnati and Louisville. In connection with this line, I recommend that every proper aid should be given for the speedy completion of the central railroad from Richmond to the point proposed at the present terminus of the canal, and that from Alexandria to Gordonsville. The railroad from the canal to Loup creek shoals would not exceed 150 miles, (to which point steamboats are now accessible), and from which to Guayandotte, should that point be selected as the terminus, it would be about 82 miles, making 232 miles of railroad. The water line by the Kanawha would be about 80, and strike the Ohio 40 miles above Guyandotte—thus giving the section of road between Loup creek shoals and Clifton Forge the double importance of being connected at both ends with water and railroad lines. The best energy of the State should therefore be turned to the speedy completion of this division of the work. There is little doubt that the Alexandria and Orange railroad and the Blue Ridge tunnel may be completed, and the Central railroad and the canal be carried to Clifton Forge by the time the railroad from the latter place to the Ohio river can be finished."

VIRGINIA

vs.

WEST VIRGINIA.

REPORT OF COMMISSION—JOHN MARSHALL, CHAIRMAN. FILED AS AN EXHIBIT FOR THE COMPLAINANT.

The fact that Virginia in 1811-12 called upon Chief Justice Marshall and others of her leading citizens to devote some weeks or months of their time to a reconnaissance of the region lying between the Blue Ridge Mountains and the Ohio, for the purpose of learning the most desirable line of communication between the waters of the Eastern Seaboard and the Western waters, and that the Great Chief Justice and the eminent men who served with him on that Commission responded to that call and devoted themselves to the arduous service which its acceptance involved, is evidence of the profound interest which in the early part of the last century the people of Virginia and her leading citizens took in that subject, and the importance which they attached to it.

The report of this historic Commission is therefore reprinted and filed as an exhibit for the complainant in this cause.

Col. Claudius Crozet, an eminent civil engineer, who, after having served as an engineer under Napoleon, and afterwards as Professor of Mathematics or Engineering in the U. S. Military Academy at West Point, was for a number of years State Engineer of Virginia, and some of the most important of her works of internal improvement were begun under his direction.

In one of his reports he refers to the service rendered by this Commission in the following language:

"The first notice of the connection of the eastern and western waters is found in a report, made at the close of 1812, by the commissioners appointed by an act of the preceding session, 'for the purpose of viewing certain rivers within this Commonwealth.' The commissioners, John Marshall, James Breckenridge, William Lewis, James M'Dowell, William Caruthers, Andrew Alexander, examined the James river, from Lynchburg up, crossed the mountains, and descended with much difficulty, and indeed personal danger, the hitherto unexplored New river. They went through this arduous task with a zeal and perseverance worthy of such men.

"A plain sluice improvement of the James and Jackson's river, up to Dunlap's creek; thence a turnpike road, across the Alleghany mountain, which has been made since, and finally a sluice navigation of the Greenbriar, New, and Kanawha rivers were, at that early day, all they thought proper to recommend.

"A remarkable, and in our day, curious passage, occurs in their report. 'Your commissioners submit with diffidence the following propositions: First, that boats impelled by steam may be employed successfully on New River * * *. But they beg leave to say, that the currents of the Hudson, of the Mohawk, and of the Mississippi, are very strong; and that a practice so entirely novel as the use of steam in navigation, will probably receive great improvement, and the power itself be so diversified as to be applied in new and different situations, &c.' These remarks, at the very dawn of steam navigation, show, on their part, much sagacity and forethought."

Besides the Great Chief Justice, the gentlemen who served upon this Commission were James Breckenridge, distinguished as a soldier, and statesman, and esteemed by contemporaries as the equal in ability, though not in oratory, of his brother, John Breckenridge, of Kentucky; William Lewis, a patriotic citizen of the highest character, a near relative of Col. Charles, and General Andrew Lewis, of Point Pleasant fame, and a worthy scion of such illustrious lineage; James M'Dowell, one of the gifted men of his generation, who afterwards rendered eminent service as a member of Congress, and as Governor of the Commonwealth; William Caruthers, a leading citizen of the Valley of Virginia, and a farmer and business man of very high character and standing; and Andrew Alexander, surveyor, engineer, representative citizen, a man of skill in his profession, and remarkable for his public spirit.

PREAMBLE AND RESOLUTION,

For re-printing the Report of the Commissioners on the Navigation of the Great Kanhawa, &c.

[AGREED TO BY BOTH HOUSES OF ASSEMBLY, FEBRUARY 14, 1814.]

WHEREAS, it would greatly promote the welfare of this Commonwealth, and the prosperity of our sister States, to form a more intimate connexion between the Eastern and Western Waters of the United States; and, with a view to that object, the General Assembly of Virginia, at a former session, appointed Commissioners to survey the head waters of James-River and the Great Kanhawa, with instructions to ascertain the practicability of extending their navigation to the base of the chain of mountains which divides them, and at the shortest and easiest portage across it; a trust which was accepted and fulfilled, by the Commissioners who acted therein, in a manner that entitles them to the thanks of their country: And, as the result of their labors has never been presented to the Legislature of the Union, nor to the governments of the several States, who cannot but feel an interest in the accomplishment of an enterprise so important to the arts, manufactures, and commerce of the United States—

Resolved, therefore, That the executive of this commonwealth be, and they are hereby empowered and requested, to cause the Report of the Commissioners to be re-printed, and the Map and References accompanying it to be reduced to a convenient scale, engraved, printed, and annexed to the Report; and, reserving two hundred and fifty copies thereof for the use of the General Assembly, to forward a copy to each of the Commissioners whose names are subscribed to the Report, to each Member of the Congress of the United States, and to the Executives of the several States and Territories.

LETTER OF MR. MARSHALL, ONE OF THE COMMISSIONERS.

A COMMUNICATION from the Governor, enclosing a Letter from the Honorable JOHN MARSHALL, and a report from the Commissioners who executed the act of the last session, entitled "An act appointing Commissioners for the purpose of viewing certain Rivers within this Commonwealth," was laid before the house.

The said Letter and Report were read as follows:

Richmond, December 26, 1812.

SIR—I hasten to submit to your Excellency, for the purpose of being laid before the General Assembly, the Report of the Commissioners who executed the act of the last session, entitled "An act appointing Commissioners for the purpose of viewing certain Rivers within this Commonwealth."

To their distance from each other, and the consequent difficulties attending the interchange of sentiment, and the attainment of their respective signatures, is to be ascribed the delay which has taken place in the performance of this part of their duty.

The more detailed report, to which the enclosed refers, is not yet received, but it is expected in a few days, and will then be transmitted to your Excellency. It was not thought advisable longer to withhold the general report, for the purpose of accompanying it with that more in detail, to which it refers.

I have the honor to be,
Sir, with great respect,
Your obedient servant,

J. MARSHALL.

His Excellency Governor BARBOUR.

INLAND NAVIGATION.

REPORT.

To the Honorable the Speaker and Members of the General Assembly, the undersigned Commissioners, named, with others, in the act entitled "An act appointing Commissioners for the purpose of viewing certain Rivers within this Commonwealth,"

RESPECTFULLY REPORT—

That, supposing the autumn to be the season which afforded the fairest prospects for giving effect to the views of the Legislature, as expressed in their act, your Commissioners agreed that a meeting should be called on the first of September, at Lynchburg. The number required by law, for the execution of the service they were directed to perform, having assembled, and the necessary preparations having been made, your Commissioners began at the Bridge at Lynchburg, to view James-river, and to take its level by sections to the mouth of Dunlop's-creek. Mr. Andrew Alexander, the surveyor of Rockbridge county, had been engaged to execute this duty under their direction. To his report, which your Commissioners believe to be accurate, they beg leave to refer, as exhibiting, in minute detail, the information required by the law.

As an actual measurement of the whole river would have employed so much time as to defer the completion of the work, until high waters might defeat the object of the Legislature, and was rendered the less necessary by previous surveys; distances were in general conjectured. The eye, aided by a time-piece, and occasionally corrected by actual measurement, furnished information, which, though not perfectly exact, was believed not to vary much from the truth, and to be substantially sufficient. Those places which present serious obstacles were measured by the chain, and the elevation was taken throughout by a spirit level.

On that part of the river which is comprised within the charter already granted, your Commissioners presume that little, if any, information is expected from them, other than will be found in the annexed report of Mr. Alexander.

From Beall's Bridge, or Crow's Ferry, to the mouth of the Cow-Pasture, no difficulty presents itself, which may not be with certainty surmounted. The falls are no where formidable; there are long stretches of smooth water, and the shalows may be so deepened as to afford water for boats bringing down from six to eight tons, and carrying up from four to six tons, if not throughout the year, through all but a very inconsiderable portion of it. Your Commissioners give the opinion, unanimously, and with great confidence, that the navigation from Crow's Ferry to the mouth of the Cow-Pasture, may, with improvements by no means expenive, be rendered as certain, as useful, and as permanent, as the navigation from the same place to Lynchburg; and that it may be used at all times when the navigation to Lynchburg can be used, with boats carrying an equal burthen—indeed, that it may be rendered more safe and less laborious, than that from the mouth of the North Fork to Lynchburg now is.

From the mouth of the Cow-Pasture to the mouth of Dunlop's-creek, the difficulties become more considerable, and their removal will require greater expenditures of money. The mass of water diminishes, and the elevation increases.—The shoals become longer and shallower, and the intervals of smooth water shorter. Yet, this rugged navigation, though totally unimproved, is now used during high water. Boats, laden with the produce of the country, pass every year from the mouth of Dunlop's-creek to Richmond. It is, therefore, proved to be, even at this time, practicable for some portion of the year. This portion varies with the seasons. Most commonly, it commences in November, and terminates late in May, or early in June.

That, by the removal of rocks, now lying promiscuously and irregularly through the bed of the river, which it will be necessary in only a few instances to blow, and by the judicious application of labor, to the collection of water in narrower spaces than it now covers, this navigation may be rendered much more secure and beneficial, and the time during which it can be used may be considerably extended, will not admit of doubt.—Whether this portion of the river may be rendered at all times boatable, depends on the depth of water to be collected in particular channels by such means as are applicable to the object.

Some of your Commissioners have been personally engaged in opening the navigation of the North Fork of James-river, through Rockbridge. They are decidedly of opinion, that the river denominated "Jackson's," contains as far as Dunlops-creek, more water and less formidable obstructions than were found in the North Fork. Yet the North Fork, though its improvement is far from being complete, is now actually used to great advantage, and is not much inferior to the river below.—Some experienced and judicious boatmen, who were employed on the expedition, who are well acquainted with the river and its navigation, unite in the declaration, that, if the means be taken which ought to be employed, that part of James-river which is between the Cow-Pasture and Dunlop's-creek, may be used by any boats which will be capable of continuing their voyage to Lynchburg.

Your Commissioners concur in this opinion; and they take occasion now to remark, that should it be deemed advisable still to adhere to the system of improvement heretofore used in the upper part of the river, the difficulties of this navigation would, they think, be much diminished by several facilities which might be given to it. They would particularly suggest chains, with buoys fastened in rocks or otherwise, or walls on which men may walk, of which boatmen might avail themselves to lessen the labor of ascending places of peculiar difficulty; and thus either to increase the load which may be carried up the river, or to diminish the number of persons necessary for carrying up a given load. They will also mention a fact deemed favorable to the object contemplated by the Legislature. It is this: although the cold may be more intense in the bosom of the mountains than below, this part of the river freezes over.

It will perhaps save the honorable the members of the Legislature some calculation, to observe, that the distance from Lynchburg to the commencement of the Blue Ridge is stated, in the report of Mr. Alexander, to be twenty-five miles one-fourth and thirty poles; the elevation to be one hundred and eleven feet eight inches; shewing an average elevation of four and an half feet to the mile.—The distance through the mountain, that is from Racoon Island to the mouth of the North Fork, is eight miles one-fourth and forty-nine poles, and the elevation one hundred and one feet six inches, giving an average elevation of upwards of twelve feet to the mile. The distance from the mouth of the North Fork to Crow's Ferry, or Beall's Bridge, the highest point to which navigation is to be carried by the James-River Company, is stated at twenty-six miles and thirty-eight poles, and the elevation is one hundred and thirty-one feet four inches; making the average elevation five feet to a mile.

The distance from Beall's Bridge, or Crow's Ferry, to the mouth of the Cow-Pasture, is stated at thirty-six miles fifty-nine poles, and the elevation is one hundred and ninety feet three inches, making the average elevation five and an half feet nearly to a mile. The distance from the mouth of the Cow-Pasture to the mouth of Dunlop's-creek, is stated at twenty-three miles three-fourths and twenty poles, and the elevation is two hundred and twenty-eight feet three inches, making the average elevation nine and an half feet to the mile.

Having reached Dunlop's-creek, your Commissioners proceeded to view and mark out what appeared to them to be the best and most direct way for a turnpike road from the mouth of that creek to the most convenient navigable point on Greenbrier river.

With some inconsiderable deviations, which will appear in the report of Mr. Alexander, already referred to, and some others which will be suggested, the road now leading from the mouth of Dunlop's-creek, by Bowyer's Sulphur Spring, to Anderson's Ford, over Greenbrier, at the mouth of Howard's-creek, is believed to be the most eligible which can be made. To that part of the road which passes from the mouth of Dunlop's-creek to the old Iron Works, a distance of about five miles, there are considerable objections, which your Commissioners are inclined to believe may be diminished. The road crosses the creek eight times, and the ground, during the winter and spring would, if much used and not well covered with stone or gravel, be much cut and be very deep. The creek too is frequently so high as not to be fordable.

Should it be found practicable, which your Commissioners believe to be the fact, to render Dunlop's-creek navigable up to its falls, some distance below the old Iron Works, these inconveniences would be in a great measure removed.

Should it be deemed unadvisable to carry navigation up Dunlop's-creek, a direction, as is understood from some of the inhabitants of that neighborhood, may be given to the road, so as to avoid five crossings of the creek, and at the same time shorten the distance. No attempt to view this way was made, because guides could not readily be procured, and your Commissioners feared that, by devoting too much time to a minor object, on which complete information is attainable with ease and certainty through various channels, they might hazard the failure of others which were believed to be of much importance.

The road from the Sulphur Spring to Greenbrier crosses Howard's-creek, which is often not fordable, six times, and is in a few places attended with some difficulty. A small improvement may be made in it, and the steepest part avoided, by returning it, near the river, to the ground over which it formerly passed, and from which it has been lately taken.

The road over the mountain has been attentively viewed, and the deviations recommended, from that now in use, carefully and plainly marked. Your Commissioners feel much satisfaction in stating, that the elevation of this part of the road may, in the most unfavorable places, be reduced to an angle of five degrees with the horison. By occasionally removing the earth, for small distances, this angle may be still further diminished. It is believed to be susceptible of improvement on as easy terms as any other road, since the materials for a turnpike are every where convenient, and not more levelling will be necessary than must be expected in passing through a mountainous country.

Your commissioners proceeded down the Greenbrier river in the boat in which they ascended the James. The season had been remarkably dry, and the water was declared by the inhabitants to be as low as at any period within their recollection. It frequently spreads over a wide bed covered with large stone, and is, in its present unimproved state, and at the season when it was viewed, so very shallow for the greater part of its course, as not to swim an empty boat. The labor of removing stone, and of dragging the boat over those which could not be removed without implements provided for the purpose, was so great, that your Commissioners at one time were enabled to advance only three miles in two days, even with the assistance of a horse and of many additional laborers. In part of the river the shoals are frequent and long, and the falls, as the report of Mr. Alexander will shew, considerable. At the great falls, which is the most important of them, the descent is twelve feet in forty-eight poles. There is no perpendicular fall at this place, but one continued rapid, with large rocks, irregularly interspersed through the bed of the river. Near the mouth of the river there is a flat rock, which continues for about two hundred and forty poles, with many irregular apertures or fissures through which the water passes. Although, in the usual state of the river, this rock is covered with water of sufficient depth for navigation; yet, such was the drought of the last autumn, it was necessary to drag the boat over its whole extent.

These difficulties present obstacles to navigation during a season when the waters are remarkably low, which can be surmounted only at a considerable expense.

But, from the best information your Commissioners can obtain, and they believe it to be correct, the Greenbrier is seldom so low at any season as it was during the last autumn; and it seldom if ever fails, for eight or nine months in the year, to be at least two feet higher than when viewed by your Commissioners; a depth of water unquestionably sufficient for the purpose of navigation. The testimony given by the inhabitants to this fact, was corroborated by appearances on the river. The indications of a recent considerable diminution of water were not to be mistaken.

On an attentive consideration of the obstacles which were found by your Commissioners to be great, while the river remains in the state in which they viewed it, they are unanimously and decidely of opinion, that its navigation may be rendered as safe, as certain, and as easy as that of the James, at all times, except when the water is unusually low. The rocks are in general loose, and may be removed without extraordinary difficulty, so as to afford a tolerably smooth passage to boats; and, by collecting the water into narrow channels, a sufficient depth may be obtained, with the exception of a short period in a very dry year, to swim any boat which can be brought at the same time down James-river. But so scanty is the supply of water in a time of uncommon drought, that doubts are entertained whether there may not be a short season of the year during which, unless a considerable expense be incurred, the navigation must be suspended. Though aided by men and horses, ten days of unremitting labor were consumed in passing from the mouth of Howard's-creek to the mouth of Greenbrier river, a distance not much exceeding forty-eight miles. In the month of June, the same voyage, if not retarded by measuring the river, might have been performed in a single day. Some of your Commissioners, however, are of opinion, that the Greenbrier may, without great additional expense, be rendered at all times passable for boats carrying half a load.

In addition to the shallowness of the water, (an inconvenience which is common to all rivers as you approach their sources, and which disappears for eight or nine months in the year) and to the rocks which have been mentioned, the obstructions to the navigation of the Greenbrier consists in its falls, and in the general rapidity of its current.

The great falls alone are of sufficient magnitude to merit particular attention. These unquestionably admit of being rendered navigable, either by opening a sluice judiciously through them, or by locks. The latter would be most expensive, but would leave the navigation less laborious.

The rapidity of the current may be estimated by observing that the descent in forty-eight miles and eighty-four poles, is three hundred and sixty-two feet ten inches, between seven and eight feet to the mile.

This current will present no difficulty to a boat descending the river. To one ascending it, the labor will be considerable, but not so considerable as in some parts of James-river.

The night of the 28th of September, was passed among the islands in the mouth of Greenbrier; and on the morning of the 29th, your Commissioners entered New-river.

The New-river, or that part of the Great Kanhawa which is above the mouth of Gauley, having to search its intricate way, and force a passage through a long chain of lofty and rugged mountains, whose feet it washes, exhibits an almost continued succession of shoals and falls, from which the navigator is sometimes, though rarely, relieved by a fine sheet of deep placid water.

The difficulties encountered in descending this river were of a character essentially different from those which were experienced in the Greenbrier. Uncommon as had been the drought, the supply of water was abundant. The boat sometimes, though rarely, rubbed upon a shoal; but in every such case it was apparent that a sufficient passage might be opened without much labor or expense. The velocity of the current and the enormous rocks which often interrupt it, the number and magnitude of the rapids and falls, the steepness, cragginess and abruptness of the banks, constitute the great impediments which at present exist to navigation between the mouth of the Greenbrier and the Great Falls of Kanhawa.

The distance from the mouth of Greenbrier to Bowyer's Ferry, is forty miles one quarter and forty-six poles, and the descent is four hundred and sixty-six feet seven inches; that is, eleven feet six inches in each mile. In general, there is much sameness in the appearance of this part of the river. Long rapids, frequently terminated by a fall of from five to ten feet, in a distance of ten, twenty, thirty, and sometimes a greater number of poles; an intervening space, sometimes more, sometimes less considerable, of swift or smooth water; rocks, sometimes above the surface, sometimes near it, so as to require great caution to save a boat from dashing on them; a copious stream, with a current commonly impetuous, constitute its leading characteristics.

Falls too great to come within this general description, will be particularly noticed.

Brook's Falls are about four miles and one-fourth below the mouth of Greenbrier. The water descends thirteen feet seven inches in fifty poles. In its most rapid part the descent is five feet ten inches in fourteen poles. The boat was navigated through this place.

A much more formidable obstruction is the falls at Richmond's Mill. These are designated in the neighborhood by the name of the "Great Falls of New-river," but are generally called at a distance, "Lick-Creek Falls."

At this place the water may with propriety be said to fall perpendicularly twenty-three feet. For this distance, the sheet which dashes over the summit is intercepted only by huge fragments of broken rock, which, having been successively disjointed from the brink of the precipice, have fallen into the foaming basin below, where, piled on each other, they form one or two benches that break the cataract. A small distance lower down is another fall of three or four feet.

Here, for the first time, the boat was taken out of the water and let down by skids.

The ground along which a canal may be carried around these falls, pursuing the course of Richmond's mill-race, was measured, and the elevation taken. The descent was found to be twenty-two feet nine inches, in one hundred and eighty-one poles.

This estimate excludes a part of the falls, between five and six feet of which are just above the head of Richmond's mill-race.

The bottom of the river for some distance above these falls, is a hard rock, often appearing above the surface, and much covered with moveable stones, some of which are very large. The bottom of the mill-race appears to be of the same description.

From Bowyer's Ferry to the Falls of the Great Kanhawa, was estimated at nineteen miles and fifty-eight poles, in which distance the river falls three hundred and thirty-one feet; that is, seventeen feet to a mile. The honorable the legislature will perceive, that below the ferry the descent, in the same distance, is greater than above. For a part of this space, the scene is awful and discouraging. The vast volume of water which rolls down New-river, and which, far above the ferry, often spreads, without becoming shallow, over a bed three or four hundred yards wide; is seldom more than one hundred or one hundred and fifty yards wide. In some places, for a mile or more in continuation, it is compressed by the mountains on each side, into a channel of from twenty to sixty yards wide; and even these narrow limits are still more narrowed by enormous rocks which lie promiscuously in the bed of the river, through which it is often difficult to find a passage wide enough for the admission of a boat. In some places the bank is formed of rugged and perpendicular cliffs of entire rock, which appear to be twenty, thirty, and forty feet high; in others, enormous, but unconnected, rocks dip into the water.

There are unequivocal indications of the river's having risen, in these narrows, from thirty to forty feet perpendicularly.

Immediately above the mouth of Gauley, the river opens and presents a beautiful sheet of deep smooth water, which is succeeded by the rocks over which it dashes, and forms the Great Falls of Kanhawa. The height of these falls is twenty feet four inches. With its name, the river looses its wild and savage aspect. It is no longer confined by rugged cliff, by mountains barely separated from each other, nor interrupted by enormous masses of rocks which are scarcely to be avoided.

Within a short distance above the falls, the current is not unmanageably swift, nor the rocks over which it passes uneven. Below, quite to the rocks which have fallen from the brink over which the cataract rushes, is a deep smooth and beautiful basin. The river is so wide as to rise, in the greatest freshes, only six or seven feet. The falls themselves constitute the impediment, and the only impediment at this place.

Your Commissioners have deemed it proper to state in their full strength, the difficulties which are to be surmounted in opening the intercourse between this part of the state of Virginia and the western country; and to put the legislature, as far as is possible, in possession of the testimony on which their opinion is formed, as well as of their opinion. If, misguided by their conviction of the importance of the object, they are too sanguine in their hopes of its accomplishment, the facts now communicated will enable the General Assembly to correct the mistaken conclusions which have been drawn, and to determine on the course which will best promote the interets of the public.

The practicability of rendering the Greenbrier navigable has already been stated. The system which may be found best adapted for the improvement of James-river, will be equally applicable to the Greenbrier, and will be equally successful.—The one river and the other will be rendered more or less valuable as more or less labor and skill may be employed on them; but there can be no mistake in saying that, without incurring an expense which any would pronounce extravagant they are both capable of being brought into extensive use. Not only in descending, but in ascending also, these rivers may be navigated to great advantage.

With respect to New-river, a judgment cannot be formed quite so decisively, nor pronounced quite so confidently. The difficulties are great, and deserve to be seriously considered.

The boat which conveyed your Commissioners, passed from the mouth of Greenbrier, to the place where their expedition terminated, without being taken out of the water, except at the Great Falls of New-river, and at the Great Falls of the Kanhawa. It was navigated in the usual way through all the other difficult places which abound in New-river, except two—both below Bowyer's Ferry. Through these it was conducted by ropes.

The boat was not laden, nor was it empty. In addition to the number of hands usually employed in navigation, it carried between two and three thousand weight. The greater part of this burthen was taken out in the most difficult places; but in many of considerable magnitude, it remained in the boat. Where the vessel was guided by ropes, the necessity of resorting to this expedient was occasioned solely by the intervention of rocks, which can be removed.

It is also worthy of notice, that this voyage was performed by boatmen, who, having never before seen the river, were reduced to the necessity of selecting their way at the moment, without the aid of previous information.

The only impediments to the descent of the boat, except at the two great falls already mentioned, were rocks lying so near the surface of the water as to strike the bottom while shooting over them. At the usual height of the river, these rocks would be entirely covered, and all danger from them be removed: but others would be placed in a situation to expose a boat to equal hazard. It is therefore necessary, even for the descending navigation, to open a plain and broad sluice through all the rapids and falls, so as to relieve boats navigating the river from all danger of being dashed against the rocks. This may be effected by removing some and blowing others.—This sluice may be so conducted as to graduate the falls where they are most sudden, and thereby, in some degree, to diminish the impetuosity of the current.

Brook's Falls, the Great Falls of New-river, and the Great Falls of Kanhawa, will probably require and admit of a different course.

The first of these, which is the least formidable of the three, will present three alternatives to the election of those who may be engaged in improving the navigation.

First—One or more locks, which may unquestionably be constructed at this place.

Second—A canal, which is already almost formed, on the north side of the river. Its completion would require that it be opened for a short distance, both where it would receive the water at the head of the falls and where it would empty itself below them.

To the eligibility of this canal, there can be but one objection. There may be impracticable rock, now hidden by the earth, so near the surface as to render this plan unadvisable.

Third—To open a sluice in the river, along its northern bank, and graduate the fall as far as may be compatible with that system of operation.

The Great Falls of New-river must be turned, by using a canal to be cut on the southern side, pursing nearly the tract of Richmond's mill-race. Should locks be employed, it will most probably be found advisable to place them in this canal. Should locks be dispensed with, there will be no difficulty in descending through this channel; but the toil of ascending, must, at this place, be considerable.

At the Great Falls of Kanhawa, there is, near Morris's mill, a very eligible place for locks. If a canal be preferred, there is every reason to believe that the ground will admit of one, which may be so extended, and the fall thereby so graduated, as to afford a safe passage to loaded boats.

These observations are formed on the state of the river when viewed by your Commissioners.—It will readily occur, that they cannot judge with certainty of the changes which may be brought about by a great rise of water.

It would seem most probable, that by such rise the falls would be diminished, because the water at their feet would pass off less rapidly than at their head. But the apprehension cannot be entirely discarded, that in the narrows, which have been mentioned, the torrent would, in a flood, be too impetuous to be trusted. It is probable, that a moderate elevation of the water would rather facilitate the passage of the boats; at least of those descending the river; but that great floods would suspend the navigation.

Having stated their view of this subject, your Commissioners will only add their opinion, that the New-river may be relied on with certainty, for the transportation of articles from east to west.

On the practicability of using this channel of conveyance for the transportation of articles from the western country, towards the rivers which empty into the Atlantic, at least so much of it as lies between Bowyer's Ferry and the Great Falls of Kanhawa, they must speak with less confidence. The great difficulty consists in the velocity of the current. For several miles, between Bowyer's Ferry and the Falls, it is believed that a canal would be impracticable. The river is susceptible of no other improvement than may be made in its channel, or on its banks. The current is often too rapid to be stemmed by a boat impelled by oars; and the water too deep to admit the use of poles. If a channel, sufficient for the safe passage of vessels, be opened, still some other means than oars or poles must be devised for impelling them up the stream.

Your Commissioners submit with diffidence the following proposition:

First—That boats impelled by steam may be employed successfully on New-river.

With the capacities of this powerful agent they are too little acquainted to speak with confidence of the use which may be made of it in the waters of Virginia. Elsewhere, it has certainly been applied with great advantage to the purposes of navigation. Neither have they that intimate knowledge of the velocity of the currents, against which vessels have been propelled by it, to compare them with that of New-river, and to hazard any decided opinion on the comparison.—But they beg leave to say, that the currents of the Hudson, of the Mohawk, and of the Mississippi, are very strong; and that a practice so entirely novel as the use of steam in navigation, will probably receive great improvement, and the power itself be so diversified in its modifications, as to be applied in new and different situations, as their exigencies may require. It is believed, that a sufficient depth of water is certainly obtainable, but whether sufficient employment may be found, to justify the use of a vessel which must, in any state of things, be constructed at considerable expense, is a question your Commissioners cannot attempt to solve.

Second—Should it be found impracticable to apply steam with advantage to the navigation of New-river, it is respectfully suggested, that between the Great Falls of Kanhawa and Bowyer's Ferry, resort may be had to horse labor.

To give this facility to the navigation, it will be necessary to construct a horse-way along the bank of the river at different heights, or at the most common height of the water. The objection that such way cannot be used at all times, will lose much of its force, when it shall be recollected that the navigation up the river will admit of being suspended for considerable intervals, with less injury to those who use it, than that which conveys to the western country articles imported for general consumption. The construction of this way, however, will require the blowing of a great quantity of rock, and will, consequently, be expensive.

Third—Should neither of these expedients be deemed eligible, it is respectfully suggested, that boats may be forced up the current, where it is too rapid for oars and too deep for poles, by the aid of chains fastened in the rocks on the bank.

Whatever doubts may be entertained respecting the navigation for boats ascending the river between the Great Falls of Kanhawa and Bowyer's Ferry; your Commissioners are entirely persuaded of the practicability of using it advantageously between the ferry and the mouth of Greenbrier.

In obedience to the law under which they have acted, your Commissioners will now proceed to state their ideas of the sums of money which will probably be necessary to open the river and make the road they have viewed.

No part of their duty has been performed with less confidence than this.

It will readily occur to the legislature, that no estimate of expense of executing so great a work as that which is to afford to the western parts of Virginia the means of conveying the produce of their lands to market, and probably to connect Virginia commercially with her sister states in the west, can have just pretensions to exactness.—Were the system of improvement, and the extent to which that system is to be carried, accurately defined; any calculations which could now be made, even by professional men, of the sum necessary for its execution, might be found to vary widely from that which would be actually expended. Still less precision can be looked for in the calculations of your Commissioners.

But it must be apparent that the expense of improvement will essentially depend on the object for which the improvement shall be made.

If the views of the legislature shall be limited to the conveyance of articles, the growth of the upper country, down James-river, the cheapness of that conveyance will certainly depend much on the degree of perfection to which the improvement may be carried; but the river, being the only channel of conveyance, will, if merely practicable, be used to some extent.

If the views of the legislature shall extend to a free commercial intercourse with the western states, or any of them, the channel selected for that intercourse will come into competition with others which now exist or may be opened, and must recommend itself to a preference by the advantages it offers. With a view to the latter object, no improvement ought to be undertaken but with a determination to make it complete and effectual.

The estimates of expense were more particularly made by Mr. Caruthers, who has been personally engaged in opening the North Fork through Rock-bridge. This gentleman made his calculations on the plan which has been adopted by the James-River Company, with such improvements as would better adapt that plan to steam navigation. According to his estimate, one hundred and ninety thousand dollars will be sufficient to accomplish the work from Beall's Bridge, or Crow's Ferry, to the Falls of the Great Kanhawa, including the road.—This estimate is formed on a comparison of the impediments to be removed, with those he had himself encountered in opening the North Fork of James-river. Some others of your Commissioners, who have too little knowledge of the labor necessary for the accomplishment of objects of this description, to confide themselves, in their own judgment, much less to recommend it to the confidence of others, are so impressed with the magnitude of the difficulties they have seen, as to be unable to persuade themselves that the work can be completed for the sum at which it has been estimated. That estimate does not appear to them to be extravagant, if the descending navigation alone be contemplated. To make the ascending navigation such as will entitle it to extensive use, and give this a preference over other routes, they submit, though with much diffidence, the opinion that at least a half a million, perhaps six hundred thousand dollars, will be requisite.

From the mouth of Dunlop's-creek to the mouth of Howard's creek, is twenty-eight miles and forty-four poles. From the first mentioned place to the summit of Alleghany mountain, is sixteen miles and thirty-six poles, and the elevation is nine hundred and forty-eight feet, which makes an angle with the horison of less than three-quarters of a degree. From the summit of the mountain to the mouth of Howard's-creek, the distance is twelve miles and eight poles, and the descent is eight hundred and thirty-eight feet seven inches, making with the horison an angle of about three-quarters of a degree. There are no peculiarities attending this route, which will render any plan the legislature may prefer for turnpiking it, more costly in its application to this road, than to others which have been constructed in various parts of the United States. It is now at least equal to, perhaps better, than any other of equal distance in the same part of the country.

In presenting to the honorable the legislature the advantages which, in the opinion of your Commissioners, will probably accrue to this state from executing the work to which their report relates, it will be necessary to divide this subject, and to consider, separately—first, those which may reasonably be expected to result from executing it in part; next, those which are to be looked for from executing it in the whole.

Should the navigation of James-river be carried up to the mouth of Dunlop's-creek, and a turnpike road be made over the Alleghany mountain, although nothing further should be done, a considerable impulse will be given to the agriculture, and a valuable effect produced on the wealth and population of a considerable tract of country. It cannot reasonably be doubted, that Bath, a part of Botetourt, and a great part of Greenbrier, Monroe, and perhaps even Giles, would find a real interest in searching for a market on James-river, for the produce of their soil, if such safe and cheap conveyance were afforded them as might be given by the improvements which have been stated.—Agriculture would mingle more than heretofore with grazing; and industry would flourish when the reward of industry should be attainable. Those more western countries, whose distance might forbid the attempt to transport grain manufactured into flour, or distilled into spirits, to the markets on James-river, might still be encouraged to bring to those markets, salt, salted provisions, and various manufactures of hemp. An increase of population would result, not only from the check which this state of things would give to emigration, but also from its operation on the inhabitants, in other respects.

Other parts of the state would derive corresponding advantages from their intercourse with a section of the country which would have more to sell and more to purchase than at present. By the augmentation of the wealth and population of a part, not only would those belonging to that part be improved in their circumstances, but the whole would be more powerful, and the public burdens being more divided, might press less heavily on each individual.

These advantages would probably be extended by improving the navigation of the Greenbrier also.

Should New-river be rendered a safe and easy channel of communication, between the Ohio and the commercial towns on James-river, the subject will assume a more important aspect, and the advantages may be estimated on a larger scale. Not only will that part of our own state which lies on the Kanawa and on the Ohio, receive their supplies and send much of their produce to market through James-river, but an immense tract of fertile country, a great part of the states of Kentucky and Ohio, will most probably give their commerce the same direction. All that part of the state of Kentucky which lies above Louisville, and all that part of the state of Ohio whose trade would pass through the river of that name, might reasonably be expected to maintain a large portion of their commercial intercourse with the Atlantic states, through the James or the Potowmac. Certainly in a contest for this interesting prize, the states through which those rivers run have geographical advantages, the benefit of which they can lose only by supineness in themselves, or by extraordinary exertions in others. It is far from being impossible, that even the south-western parts of Pennsylvania may look down one of these rivers for their supplies of goods manufactured in Europe.

Let the importance attached by men best acquainted with the subject to the commerce of the west attest its value. The exertions which other states appear to be making to secure it, will probably awaken the attention of Virginia to that part of it which should naturally belong to her.

There is still another aspect in which this subject deserves to be viewed.

That intimate connection which generally attends free commercial intercourse, the strong ties which are formed by mutual interest, and the interchange of good offices, bind together individuals of different counties, and are well calculated to cherish those friendly sentiments, those amicable dispositions, which at present unite Virginia to a considerable portion of the western people. At all times the cultivation of these dispositions must be desirable but, in the vicissitude of human affairs, in that mysterious future, which is in reserve, and is yet hidden from us, events may occur to render their preservation too valuable to be estimated in dollars and cents.

The advantages which may result to Virginia, from opening this communication with the western country, will be shared in common with her by the states of Kentucky and Ohio.

Considering it as a medium for the introduction of foreign articles into those states, it has claims to their serious attention.

The proposition that a nation finds its true interest in multiplying its channels of importation, admitting them to be equally convenient, is believed to be incontrovertible. In addition to those arguments in support of this proposition which belong to every case, the situation of the western states suggests some which are peculiar to themselves, and which well deserve their consideration.

The whole of that extensive and fertile country, a country increasing in wealth and population with a rapidity which baffles calculation, must make its importations up the Mississippi alone, or through the Atlantic states. When we take into view the certain growth of the country, we can scarcely suppose it possible that any commercial city on the banks of that river can keep pace with that growth, and furnish a supply equal to the demand. The unfriendliness of the climate to human life, will agricultural capital still more sensible. It will tend render this disparity between the commercial and still more to retard a population of that sound mercantile character, which would render some great city on that majestic river, a safe emporium for the western world.

In times of profound peace, then, the states on the Ohio would make sacrifices of no inconsiderable magnitude, by restricting their importations to a single river. But, in time of war, their whole trade might be annihilated. When it is recollected that the Mississippi empties itself into the Gulph of Florida, which is surrounded by foreign territory; that the island of Cuba and the coast of East Florida completely guard the passage from its mouth to the ocean; that the immense commerce flowing down its stream, holds forth irresistible allurements to cruizers, the opinion seems well founded, that scarcely a vessel making for that place could reach its port of destination.

But the length of the voyage up the Mississippi and Ohio, must be attended with delay so inconvenient to persons engaged in commerce, as to render a shorter route, though not less expensive, more eligible. For importation of many articles, there is much reason to believe that a decided preference would always be given to the transportation through the United States, were that transportation rendered as easy as it is capable of being made.

The export trade during peace, so far as the articles exported were designed for a foreign market, would, more probably, pass exclusively down the Mississippi. But those articles which are consumed in the United States, as manufactures of hemp, would find their way to market through interior and shorter channels.

If the direct route through the Atlantic states would, for many purposes, be more eligible than that through the Gulph of Florida, which must be often connected with a coasting voyage to or from an Atlantic port, then the multiplication of those routes, if in themselves equal, by presenting a greater choice, and by accommodating more territory, must be desirable.

But your Commissioners are sanguine in the opinion, that the communication through the rivers they have viewed, if properly made, will possess advantages over every other, which cannot fail to recommend it to a large portion of the states of Kentucky and Ohio. All that part of the western country which draws its supplies and transports its produce through the river Ohio, and which lies east of Louisville and west of the Pennsylvania line, perhaps a part of the state of Pennsylvania itself, could probably use this route more advantageously than any other; unless, indeed, that through the Potowmac, connected with Monongehela, Cheat, or Yohaghena, should come into competition with it, for the eastern part of the country just mentioned.

That it would, for the importation of articles from Europe, and from the east, (with a few exceptions) and for the exportation of those which are consumed in the United States, be preferred to the voyage through the Mississippi, unless the introduction of steam boats should essentially vary the present state of things, may safely be assumed from the fact, that a land carriage between Pittsburg and Philadelphia or Baltimore, and a carriage up or down the Ohio, are now used for the purposes described, in preference to the route by New Orleans.

The present price for the transportation of goods from Philadelphia or Baltimore to Pittsburg, is understood to be from seven to ten dollars per hundred weight.

The price of transportation from Richmond, up James-river to the mouth of Dunlop's-creek, thence across the Alleghany to Greenbrier, and down to the mouth of the Great Kanhawa, will certainly depend on the goodness of the road and the degree of perfection to which the navigation may be carried. Your Commissioners believe that a sound national economy would dictate such improvements as would reduce the price of freight, although the labor employed in making them might be procured by an augmentation of toll, and some expenditure of public money.

Should the navigation of James-river be rendered as safe and as easy as may be reasonably expected, and the Greenbrier and New-river be improved, in such manner as the object will justify, your Commissioners believe they hazard nothing in saying, that the expense of transporting one hundred weight from Richmond to the mouth of the Great Kanhawa, will not exceed half the price of transporting the same weight from Baltimore or Philadelphia, to the same place.

The immense works meditated in New York, will certainly, if executed, give to that state great advantages in a competition for the trade of the lakes. But if other convenient and more direct channels be opened, it is not probable that the commerce of the Ohio will take the circuitous route by the lakes.

The expense of transportation from New York through the canal contemplated, can only be conjectured. The character of the rivers which would be used, is not well understood, but they must possess many advantages to give them a preference over the direct way through Virginia to the Ohio.

Your Commissioners, however, take the liberty to repeat, that the success of any attempt to obtain that share of the commerce of the west, to which this state, from her geographical situation and her rivers, would seem to be entitled, must depend entirely on the safety and cheapness of her navigation. A mode of transportation by water in itself insecure, or so laborious as to be little less expensive than carriage by land, will never change the channels in which this trade already flows.

The advantages to accrue to the United States, from opening this new channel of intercourse between the eastern and the western states, are those which necessarily result to the whole body from whatever benefits its members, and those which must result to the United States, particularly from every measure which tends to cement more closely the union of the eastern with the western states.

In those operations, too, which the exigencies of government may often require, this central channel of communication by water may be of great value. For the want of it, in the course of the last autumn, government was reduced to the necessity of transporting arms in waggons from Richmond to the falls of the great Kanhawa. A similar necessity may often recur.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA, COMPLAINANT,

v.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, DEFENDANT.

ON THE MOTION OF DEFENDANT TO MODIFY THE ORDER OF REFERENCE.

The complainant, by her counsel, respectfully objects to the modifications proposed by the defendant to the order of reference, and for grounds of objection indicates the following, viz:

(1) The order of reference directs the master to ascertain and report:

> "2. The extent and value of the territory of Virginia and of West Virginia June 20, 1863," &c.

The proposed modification of this section is as follows, viz:

> "The territorial area and assessed valuation of the States of Virginia and West Virginia June 20, 1863."

The inquiry should not be restricted to the assessed value of the territory, but should be allowed to embrace every reasonable and proper means of ascertaining the actual value of all of the elements of wealth that together made up the value of the State. When one State is spoken of as wealthier than another, reference is not had to the assessed valuation of the lands, but to all of the resources of the State which are available for producing revenue.

The elements of wealth of West Virginia, even between January, 1861, and June, 1863, were the coal, the oil, the gas, and the hardwoods, which then as now abound throughout its eastern half. These elements of wealth have no place in the assessments for taxation which existed at the dates named. The assessments of land were made in Virginia every ten years. The assessment next preceding January, 1861, and June, 1863, was made in 1856, and manifestly affords no just ground for ascertaining the relative values of the two States as a basis on which the common public debt may justly or equitably be apportioned between these States.

In this connection we may say that there is now before us a copy of the official Report of the Auditor of Virginia, giving in tabulated form exact and full statements of the area and assessed value of each of the counties in the old State, of the lots in each of the cities and towns, and the value of all the personal property within the limits of the State. These tables of statistics, occupying nearly seven hundred pages of closely printed matter, give all the information that can be desired as to the assessed valuation of the real and personal property within the State in the years 1860 and 1861. But this apportionment of the common liability of the two States for the public debt should not and cannot equitably be made on the basis of the assessed values of the property of the States, because the assessed value was not in any case intended to express the actual value. Indeed, it was not intended to be more than two-thirds of the actual value of the property.

The assessment of 1856 did not embrace any of the elements of wealth which since 1861 have formed the principal basis of the wealth of the counties forming the State of West Virginia.

(2) It is proposed to modify the third paragraph of the order of reference by adding to it, at the end, the words "prior to January 1, 1861," the effect of which would be to direct that, even although the Commonwealth of Virginia had expended money within the territory now constituting West Virginia since the first of January, 1861, and prior to June 20, 1863, she should not be credited therewith in this account. Why not?

The "restored State of Virginia" had no existence prior to July, 1861, and then only to a limited extent and for certain purposes; but even that phantasm of a State, although "what seemed its head the likeness of a kingly crown had on," yet in time, when it had served its purpose, it faded back into the name and body of the present Commonwealth of Virginia. So it would seem to be but just that if Virginia had at any time prior to the creation of West Virginia expended money within these western counties, and West Virginia reaped the benefit of it, she should be made to account for it.

(3) The fourth paragraph of the order of reference provides as follows, viz:

> "4. Such proportion of the ordinary expenses of the government of Virginia, since any of the debt was contracted, as was properly assignable to the counties which were created into the State of West Virginia, on the basis of the average to the population of Virginia, with and without slaves, as shown by the census of the United States."

Defendant proposes to modify this as follows, viz:

> "The ordinary expenses of the government of Virginia, since any of said debt was contracted, and > prior to January 1, 1861, on the basis of the average total population of Virginia, with and without slaves, as shown by the census of the United States."

As stated, the proposed modification, standing alone, is unintelligible. The object of the inquiry is to ascertain what proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government should be charged to the counties now forming West Virginia.

The expenses of the government of the restored State government from June or July, 1861, to June 20, 1863, when the State of West Virginia was created, were all furnished from the funds of the Commonwealth of Virginia, as appears from the acts of the legislature referred to in the progress of this cause. So that the latter date would be the proper one, if any amendment at all is to be made.

(4) Paragraph 5 of the order of reference is as follows, viz:

> "5. And also on the basis of the fair estimated valuation of the property, real and personal, by counties, of the State of Virginia."

Defendant asks to modify as follows, viz:

> "5. And also on the basis of the assessed valuation of the property, real and personal, by counties, of the State of Virginia during the same period."

We have already called attention to this attempt to restrict the inquiry to the assessed valuation, in commenting upon the proposed modification to paragraph No. 2. The assessed value of real property never exceeded two-thirds of its market value, and, as appears from the Auditor's Report of 1860 and 1861, the assessments of all lands in Virginia were made in 1856, and none later than that date. This assessment did not embrace, as distinct subjects of valuation, coal, or gas, or oil, or hardwoods, which constitute the basis of the large wealth of West Virginia. These all existed in 1861, and their presence was considered in estimating the value of land in transactions between vendor and vendee. Oil was produced in immense quantities in 1862, and was prepared for market at the town of Elizabeth, in West Virginia, in that year. These elements of wealth and value would have been taken into account in any proceeding for partition between joint owners, but were not considered in assessment for taxation.

From 1861 to 1865 West Virginia was the seat of war; few, if any, actual transactions of sale of lands took place, and no normal standard of valuation existed. The difficulties are great enough in the way of reaching the actual values of land in that State during that period without adding the inequitable standard of assessment for taxation.

(5) Paragraph 6 of the order of reference provides as follows, viz:

> "6. All moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the State of West Virginia during the period prior to the admission of the latter State into the Union."

The defendant proposes to modify this section as follows, viz:

> "6. All moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the State of West Virginia during the said period and prior to January 1, 1861."

That is, the defendant wishes to limit the period within which the Commonwealth should be charged with moneys received from the western counties to the 1st of January, 1861, while the court would extend that period to June 20, 1863. As we do not think that either date will make any difference in the account, we leave this matter to the court.

Defendant, in proposing the names of gentlemen from which a selection may be made by the court of a special master to state the account in this cause, has found it needful to advise the court that it has deemed it right not to consider any citizen of centers where "West Virginia certificates" are owned, or sold, or traded in, and then it proceeds to nominate Mr. Charles E. Littlefield, of Maine.

We state for the information of the court that one of the largest certificate-holders who has made himself known to us during this litigation is a good citizen of the State of Maine. The two gentlemen named by defendant are altogether unimpeachable personally. We would not have nominated them because Mr. Littlefield lives so far away from the counsel and from the records from which all the information required is to be had, and because Mr. John W. Yerkes is at present a member of the firm of Hamilton, Yerkes & Colbert, who are the counsel for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Co., which is the largest taxpayer in West Virginia, contributing, as we are advised, one-eleventh of the taxes paid into the treasury. It has, therefore, a large interest in reducing the burdens which may rest upon that State and thereby lead to an increase of taxation.

On behalf of the Commonwealth of Virginia, we announced to counsel for West Virginia our purpose to present to the court the name of Mr. John Prentiss Poe, of the city of Baltimore, but were informed by them that Mr. Poe was counsel in a chancery cause of Maryland v. West Virginia, pending in this court, and was on that account ineligible. In this we concurred at the moment, but have since learned from unquestionable sources that Mr. Poe did file such a bill in his official character of Attorney General of Maryland, but that since the expiration of his term of office, now many years ago, he has been in nowise concerned in the cause. We therefore add his name to those already presented, and say that Mr. Poe is a graduate of Princeton, some time a bank clerk, and since 1858 a lawyer of recognized standing in the courts of Maryland and its neighboring States, and for many years a counsellor on the rolls of this court. He is the author of the standard works of Law and Equity Practice in Maryland and was some time the Attorney General of that State.

v.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

EXCEPTIONS OF THE STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA TO THE REPORT OF CHARLES E. LITTLEFIELD, SPECIAL MASTER, FILED IN THE ABOVE CAUSE ON THE 17th DAY OF MARCH, 1910.

Now comes the State of West Virginia, by William G. Conley, her Attorney General, and excepts to the said report as to the following findings set out therein.

In specifying these exceptions this Defendant will set them out by paragraph as numbered in said decree of reference and in said report, and will refer to the item number and page in said report wherever it is possible to do so.

PARAGRAPH III. OF DECREE.

"3. All Expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the Territory now constituting the State of West Virginia since any part of the Debt was contracted."

The Defendant, the State of West Virginia, excepts to the finding of the Special Master in reporting as expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia since any part of the debt was contracted the following items:

Page 44. Item 2. Covington & Ohio Railroad, $1,146,460.42,

Pages 65-71. Item 14. Kanawha River Improvements, $59,572.36.

Page 72. Item 25. Brandonville, Kingwood & Evansville Road, $10,595.73.

Page 72. Item 35. Kingwood & West Union Turnpike, $18,140.61.

Pages 75-6. Item 55. Surveys, $106,416.14. The Master finds and allows the sum of $60,873.19, and the exception is to this last amount found by the Master as an expenditure.

Page 80. Item 150. Loan to the Town of Bath, $2,500.00.

Said Defendant also excepts to said report for that said Master has found, under said Paragraph III, at page 83 of his said report, that the total of the expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory of West Virginia amounts to $2,811,599.98, instead of the sum of $1,251,288.92.

PARAGRAPH IV. OF DECREE.

"4. Such Proportion of the Ordinary Expenses of the Government of Virginia since any of said debt was contracted, as was properly assignable to the Counties which were created into the State of West Virginia on the basis of the average total population of Virginia, with and without slaves, as shown by the census of the United States."

The Defendant, the State of West Virginia, excepts to said report of the Special Master in that he finds that the following item is not a just credit against the total of what he finds to be the ordinary expenses of the State Government of Virginia, to wit:

Pages 114-16. Item No. 1. Tobacco Receipts, $353,123.96.

The said Defendant further excepts to said report in that he finds that the following items are part of the ordinary expenses of the State Government of Virginia during the period, from March 19, 1823, to December 31, 1860, inclusive, to wit:

Pages 118-19. Item 5. Maps, Board of Public Works, $11,446.48

Page 120. Item 7. International Exchanges, $2,836.19.

Page 121. Item 9. Printing Treasury Notes, $375.74.

Page 125. Item 16. Calling out Militia at Wheeling in 1836, $1,099.00.

Page 126. Item 18. Attorney General's fees for prosecuting Seldon, Withers & Company, $500.00.

Page 127. Part of Item 19. The item of $5,000.00 expended under the Act of February 14, 1844.

Page 128. Item 23. Sundry Board of Public Works Expenses, $36,728.50.

Pages 128-9. Item 24. Interest on public debt, aggregate, $18,574,747.84.

The next three items, found on pages 129 to 134, inclusive, of the report, are not numbered therein, but for convenience in designation we will call them herein by the serial numbers following item 24, to each of which three items the Defendant excepts, to wit:

Pages 129-31. Item 25. Harper's Ferry Raid, $251,763.65.

Pages 132-4. Item 26. Expended for Primary Schools, $2,400,331.11.

Page 134. Item 27. General expenses connected with surveys, $106,983.67.

The said Defendant further excepts to said report in that the Special Master, at page 135 of his said report, finds that the aggregate amount of the ordinary expenses of the Commonwealth of Virginia for the period, March 19, 1823, to December 31, 1860, inclusive, was $40,274,896.70, instead of the sum of $18,529,960.56.

The said Defendant further excepts to the finding of the Special Master found on a page of his report not numbered, but which is shown by the context should be numbered 141, and which is in the following words:

> "I find that the method adopted by the plaintiff of ascertaining 'the average total population,' is the closest and most accurate approximation upon which the ordinary expenses can be apportioned to 'the average total population,' as the object to be ascertained, is the population in existence, at the time the ordinary expenses to be apportioned, were paid, and I therefore adopt the plaintiff's method."

And also excepts to the assignment of the ordinary expenses to West Virginia upon the said method, as set forth on pages 139 and 140 of said report.

PARAGRAPH V. OF DECREE.

> "5. And also on the basis of the fair estimated valuation of the property, Real and Personal, by Counties, of the State of Virginia."

The Defendant, the State of West Virginia, excepts to the finding of the Special Master as found on page 155 of his report, in that he finds that the fair estimated valuation of the real estate in the counties in Virgina on the 20th of June, 1863, was only $148,042,730.15.

The said Defendant also excepts to the ruling of the Special Master (page 152), admitting as competent evidence the testimony of J. B. Lightfoot and the schedules accompanying the same, concerning certain private sales and unofficial appraisements of various parcels of real estate in particular localities in the State of Virginia in the year 1863.

The said Defendant also excepts to the ruling of the Special Master (pages 153-5), admitting the opinions of the witnesses, Hunter, Scott, Branch, Wellford, Taylor, Hawes, Williams and McCabe, to show the alleged depreciation of real estate in the State of Virginia in the year 1863.

The said Defendant also excepts to the finding of the Special Master (page 156), wherein he finds that the fair estimated value of the real estate in the counties of West Virginia was on June 20th, 1863, the sum of $67,676,127.44.

The said Defendant also excepts to the finding of the Special Master on page 166 of his said report, that the sum of $11,108,-300.13, assessed by the State of Virginia as income, was not part of her personal property.

PARAGRAPH VI. OF DECREE.

"6. All moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the Counties included within the State of West Virginia during the period prior to the admission of the latter State into the Union."

The Defendant, the State of West Virginia, excepts to the report of the Special Master in that he refuses to allow as a credit to the State of West Virginia as moneys paid into the Treasury of the Commonwealth of Virginia from the counties now forming West Virginia the following items, to wit:

Page 176. Item 7. Dividends from Banks in West Virginia counties, $786,666.98.

Page 176. Item 8. Dividends and interest from Turnpike Companies in West Virginia counties, $13,595.48.

Page 176. Item 9. Dividends from Bridge Companies in West Virginia, $6,028.51.

Page 176. Item 10. Dividends from Interstate Turnpike Companies (proportion), $1,355.92.

Said Defendant also excepts to said report because the Special Master finds, at page 179 of his report, that only the sum of $6,105,- 884.75 was paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth of Virginia from the counties included within the State of West Virginia during the period from March 19, 1823, to December 31, 1860, both inclusive, instead of the larger sum, to wit, $7,051,215.56, as shown by Joint Exhibit F-1, pages 805-6 of printed record.

PARAGRAPH VII. OF DECREE.

> "7. The amount and value of all money, property, stocks and credits which West Virginia received from the Commonwealth of Virginia, not embraced in any of the preceding items, and not including any property, stocks or credits which were obtained or acquired by the Commonwealth after the date of the organization of the Restored Government of Virginia, together with the nature and description thereof."

The Defendant, the State of West Virginia, excepts to the finding of the Special Master on pages 189-193 of his report, that the value of the stock held by the State of Virginia in the Northwestern Bank of Virginia on the 20th day of June, 1863, was the sum of $427,250.00, and further excepts to said report in that he did not find the same was only $136,630.00.

The said Defendant further excepts to many other errors apparent upon the face of said report, and prays that said exceptions, and each of them, heretofore set out may be considered and sustained.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

To the Honorable the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States:

Your petitioner, The State of West Virginia, by William G. Conley, Attorney General, in pursuance of the notice duly given to the plaintiff and filed herein, humbly prays leave to be permitted in some proper way under the order of this court to take and file herein testimony, oral and documentary, for the purpose of proving that the plaintiff, The Commonwealth of Virginia, has no interest or ownership in the subject-matter of this bill.

Your petitioner further shows and avers that no opportunity has been given to the petitioner to take this testimony; that it is testimony pertinent to the issues in this cause as made in the bill and answer filed herein.

That this testimony was not pertinent to any matter referred to the special master, and no testimony could properly have been admitted by him in relation thereto under the terms of the decree of reference.

Your petitioner further avers that this petition is not filed and motion made for the purpose of delay, but alone for the purpose of properly presenting this cause to the court.

Now comes the State of West Virginia, defendant herein, by William G. Conley, her attorney general, and respectfully moves this honorable court to postpone the hearing of this cause until the same can be argued before and considered by a full bench, for the following reasons:

FIRST. Because the controversy herein is between two sovereign States.

SECOND. Because most of the basic questions involved herein are of great and far-reaching importance. They involve all the measures and acts resulting in the creation of the State of West Virginia. The matters in controversy have been long pending and have aroused deep interest and created widely differing convictions between the citizens of the two States. They have been the subject of legislation and public discussion to such degree that the hearing and determination of this cause before and by all the justices of this honorable court is in the highest sense proper and desirable.

THIRD. Because, in the present posture of this suit, all questions in respect of law and merits, are still open and stand for argument and judgment, except the question of the jurisdiction of this honorable court to hear and determine the cause which has been heretofore decided "without prejudice to any question."

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA, Complainant,

vs.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, Defendant.

Complainant's Exceptions to Report of the Special Master Dated March 17, 1910.

I. Complainant's First Exception.

For errors of law apparent in the record, complainant respectfully excepts to the statements contained in the master's report in regard to the literary fund, save and except so far as they show the creation, existence, and amount of such fund, and especially does complainant except to the master's conclusions that the Board of the Literary Fund (a corporation) had no right to sue and be sued and that the fund was the unconditional property of the State and subject to its control and ownership, while the said fund was under the law held and controlled by the board and the State in trust for educational purposes alone. See Master's Report, pp. 6 to 30, and acts in Appendix to Record, pp. 205-208.

II. Complainant's Second Exception.

Complainant respectfully excepts to the report and findings of the special master under paragraph III of the decree of reference, for not allowing to Virginia, and charging against West Virginia, "all expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia since any part of the debt was contracted"; but on the contrary excluding from those charges against West Virginia, a large number of items of expenditure which were made by Virginia in that territory during that period, on the ground that, having been made through the medium of joint stock companies, they were expenditures made by those companies out of their own funds and not by the State, and were "indirect," and not "direct" expenditures (Report of Special Master, pp. 39, 62, and 85).

The items, the disallowance of which by the special master is here respectfully excepted to, are the following expenditures, all of which were made by Virginia for the construction of "works of internal improvement" and were actually made in West Virginia territory, namely:

(1) For Bridges: Expenditures made by Virginia upon bridges in West Virginia territory, built by joint stock companies owned partly by the Commonwealth—Items 57 to 65, inclusive, of Joint Exhibit C-1, p. 4, R., 375; Special Master's Report, p. 85—aggregating	$78,412.50
(2) Expenditures made by Virginia in the improvement of the navigation of West Virginia rivers by joint stock companies—Items 66 to 69, inclusive, of Joint Exhibit C-1, p. 4; R., 375; Special Master's Report, p. 85—aggregating.....	210,500.00

(3) Expenditures made by Virginia upon turnpikes wholly in West Virginia territory, built by joint stock companies:
(a) On Charleston and Berryville turnpike, in West Virginia—Item No. 6 of Joint Exhibit C-1, p. 2; R., p. 373; Special Master's Report, pp. 64 and 84	$11,932.52
(b) On turnpikes and roads mentioned in items 70 to 147, inclusive, of Joint Exhibit C-1, pp. 4, 5, and 6; R., 375, 376, and 377; Special Master's Report, pp. 78, 79, and 85	803,555.83
Total expenditures by Virginia, through joint stock companies, on turnpikes and roads in West Virginia territory	815,488.35	$815,488.35
Total aggregate of items, the disallowance of which is here excepted to		$1,104,400.85

Paragraph III of the decree, closely following the terms of the Wheeling ordinance, directs the special master to ascertain and report "all expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting West Virginia," &c.

This required that all such expenditures, however made, should be included in this account.

The special master has, as we respectfully submit, erred in including in this account only such expenditures as were made "directly," and excluding such as were, as is alleged, made "indirectly" by the Comonwealth.

Joint Exhibit C-1 is an agreed schedule as to the figures stated therein, but not as to the classification or allotment of the charges therein made. There is, therefore, no question of fact whatever that these expenditures were all made, and were made upon the soil of West Virginia. Nor can there be any question that the amounts of money making up these aggregates were all paid out of the treasury of the Commonwealth to joint stock companies for the express purpose of constructing the several internal improvements in West Virginia counties, which such companies were respectively distinctly formed to construct. The State received certificates of stock for the money so expended, but the expenditures, though they were made on West Virginia territory immediately by joint stock companies, the agencies or media selected by the State (of which West Virginia then formed an integral part) for that purpose, were none the less, in fact, made mediately by the State.

Whether they were mediate or immediate, "direct" or "indirect" expenditures made no difference, as neither the Wheeling ordinance nor the decree make or justify any distinction between direct and indirect expenditures; for both the decree and the ordinance require "all the State expenditures" to be charged.

While there is no question of fact involved in this exception, we refer the court to Joint Exhibit C-1, pp. 4, 5 and 6; R., pp. 375, 376, and 377; to the acts of the General Assembly of Virginia, Appendix, pp. 3 to 10, 12 to 19, 20 to 23, and 136 to 145; and to the Master's Report, pp. 39 to 43, and p. 83, and last three paragraphs of page 85. See also report of the finance committee of the Senate of West Virginia, filed as Exhibit 3 with defendant's answer, which confirms this view. R., 168-9.

III. Complainant's Third Exception.

Complainant respectfully excepts to the finding of the special master, under paragraph V of the decree, of the fair estimated value of the real and personal property in the counties of Virginia as of January 1, 1861 (Special Master's Report, pp. 167, 168, and 173), as not being responsive to that paragraph or any other paragraph of the decree.

IV. Complainant's Fourth Exception.

Complainant respectfully excepts to the findings of the special master under paragraph I' of the decree:

(1) For including slaves in his statement of the fair estimated value of the personal property in Virginia on the 20th of June, 1863, notwithstanding the fact that all of them had been then emancipated by the proclamation of the President which became effective January 1, 1863.

(2) For adopting the assessed value of slaves in June, 1863 ($250,851,591, or $634.89 apiece), as their fair estimated value at that time, and the assessed value of personal property other than slaves ($152,844,637.59) as its fair estimated value at that time, instead of finding the fair estimated value of all personal property then in Virginia (including slaves, which we insist should be excluded) to have been not exceeding 50 per cent of the assessed value as reported by the master. The evidence establishes the fact that there was an enormous destruction and depreciation of personal property in Virginia in June, 1863, in consequence of the violence and waste of the war then raging, and that the ratio of value which gold at that time bore to Confederate currency, the only medium of exchange in Virginia, was from 7 to 8 for 1. Special Master's Report, pp. 168, 169, 170, and Exhibit "E–1," pp. 5, 6, and 7; R., 643, 644, and 645. See also Plaintiff's Exhibit "E–2," R., p. 647, and deposition of Charles U. Williams, p. 780.

(a) Slaves, as above stated, should not have been included in the account at all. The President's emancipation proclamation had then become effective, and the tenure by which slaves may have been then nominally held as property was so precarious and worthless that they constituted no basis upon which to hypothecate any State liability whatever.

(b) If they could have been fairly treated as property for any purpose in this litigation, then the special master's statement of their value is greatly excessive. This will be manifest from the following facts:

The master finds all of the personal property in the present State of Virginia, including slaves, to have been of the fair estimated value of $403,696,228.59 on the 20th of June, 1863—page 172 of his report.

He finds the fair estimated value of the personal property in Virginia, without slaves, on the same day to have been $152,844,637.59. Idem.

His estimate of the fair value of the slaves in that territory at that date was, therefore, the difference between $403,696,228.59 and $152,844,637.59, or $250,851,591. This is the amount which the slaves in the present State of Virginia are computed to have been worth in 1863 by said exhibit printed at pages 643, 644, and 645 of the record returned with the master's report, and this computation the master has adopted.

That computation is grossly inaccurate in two particulars: First, it takes the number of slaves in the Commonwealth to have then been 395,105. To do this it assumes, without any proof, that there were in June, 1863, the same number of slaves in the counties and cities occupied or dominated by the military forces of the United States that there were at the time the slaves in those counties were last assessed for taxation. The thousands of slaves in the territory so occupied or dominated were not only then free under the terms of the emancipation proclamation, but they were then actually free, and no longer worth anything as property. There is no evidence anywhere in the record that there were 395,105 slaves in Virginia on the 20th of June, 1863. That number manifestly includes thousands of former slaves who were then practically free.

The special master places an excessive value upon this excessive number of slaves.

He counts the 395,105 slaves as then worth $250,851,591, or $634.89 apiece.

The agreed fair estimated value of the 490,865 slaves in Virginia on the 31st of December, 1860, was $344 apiece, or $162,537,936. Master's Report, p. 167; Stenographic Report of the Hearings before the Master, vol. 20, p. 3153.

The special master's finding is that 395,105 slaves were worth in June, 1863, $98,313,655 more than 490,865 slaves were worth in December, 1860, and that each slave in Virginia was worth in June, 1863, $290.89 more than the sum which the parties have agreed was the fair estimated average value of each in December, 1860.

There is no evidence in the record which shows or tends to show that slaves were more valuable in Virginia in June, 1863, than they were in December, 1860. All the evidence which relates to this subject tends to show that they were vastly less valuable at the latter date. See evidence of Col. John P. Branch, R., 756; of Major P. A. Wellford, R., 763, answer to Q. 35, and the evidence hereinafter referred to as to the general depreciation of all personal property in Virginia in June, 1863, and as to the taxation and assessment of such property, including slaves, at its value in Confederate currency.

(c) The uncontradicted testimony in the cause shows that personal property throughout Confederate Virginia had depreciated fifty per cent (50%) as a minimum in June, 1863, as compared with the period in 1861 and 1860 before the war. See depositions of R. W. Hunter, W. W. Scott, John P. Branch, Philip A. Wellford, William G. Taylor, S. H. Hawes, Charles U. Williams, and W. Gordon McCabe (R., 739 to 786).

These witnesses prove that there was an enormous deterioration, destruction and depreciation in the value of personal property in Virginia between those dates. Major P. A. Wellford says (R., pp. 763, 764, and 765):

> "Q. 37. Taking all the movable personal property, live stock, farming utensils, vehicles of every kind, household and kitchen furniture, the stores of tobacco and corn, what would you say, as a minimum, was the depreciated (depreciation) of all personal property in Virginia in June, 1863, as compared with January, 1861.
>
> "A. Leaving out cotton and tobacco, I would say that it was nearly 75 per cent. Carriages and wagons were all worn out. All farming utensils were almost worn out. There was very little demand for them. Men did not cultivate more than one-half or two-thirds of the acreage that he had done before. They had no new implements, and all the carriages and farming implements were almost worn out.
>
>
> "Q. 40. What would you say, as a minimum, was the depreciation of all personal property in Virginia in June, 1863, upon the basis of any sort of sound money? What was the per cent of depreciation in June, 1863, as compared with January, 1861?
>
> "A. Not less than 50 per cent. There had been no repairs made to furniture. All the mechanics were in the army. If a bed broke down, a man had to fix it the best way he could. The same way with all farming utensils and everything else.
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> "Q. 50. From your observation and knowledge at that time, what was the condition of the people of Virginia in the territory now constituting the Commonwealth?
>
> "A. A large proportion was abject poverty."

See the testimony of the other witnesses above named to the same effect.

(d) The above-mentioned witnesses prove, what is so a part of the history of the country and the times as to require no proof, that in Confederate Virginia in June, 1863, the paper money of the Confederate States was the currency of the people, in which, and with reference to which their contracts were made and their business transacted; that it was practically the only medium of exchange and standard of value, the currency in which all State taxes were levied and were payable, and as a necessary consequence from these uncontroverted and incontrovertible facts, that it was the currency in which or with reference to which as a measure of value, the annual assessments of personal property for taxation were generally made in the portions of the State dominated by the Richmond governments. As to these points see the testimony of R. W. Hunter, R., 744, answers to Q.'s 36, 37, and 38; W. W. Scott, R., 749, answers to Q.'s 14 to 20; of Col. John P. Branch, R., 754, answers to Q.'s 14, 15, and 17, and page 758 and answers to Q.'s 43 to 50; of Major Wellford, R., 765, answers to Q.'s 46 to 50; of Mr. William G. Taylor, R., 768, answers to Q.'s 6 to 12; of Mr. S. H. Hawes, R., 773, answer to Q. 24; of Mr. C. U. Williams, R., 781, answers to Q.'s 1 to 5 on redirect examination. Messrs. Taylor (R., 768-9) and Williams (R., 781) both state in effect that taxes were then assessed in Confederate money.

(e) The fact that the assessments of personal property made as of February 1, 1863, were generally made in Confederate Virginia with reference to Confederate values and in Confederate money, and that those assessments were excessive valuations of personal property, if they be treated as valuations in good money, appears from a comparison of the assessments in the counties of Confederate Virginia for 1863 with the assessments of personal property generally in the same counties in 1861, incomplete copies of which assessments are returned by the master with his report.

See also Acts of General Assembly of Virginia at Richmond, of March 22, 1862, and March 28, 1863, making State taxes payable in Confederate money (Appendix to the Record, page 132).

(f) Under the foregoing state of facts, and upon the evidence in the cause, the scale of depreciation of Confederate money as compared with specie, which was 4 for 1 on the 1st of February, 1863, should have been applied to all of the assessments of personal property in 1863 in the Virginia counties which were then occupied and dominated by the military and civil forces of the Richmond governments, State and Confederate.

Particularly should this have been done as to the slaves everywhere in Virginia.

(g) Upon the above-mentioned proofs the valuation of all personal property in Virginia on the 20th of June, 1863, cannot be fairly estimated at more than one-half of its assessed value for that year.

V. Complainant's Fifth Exception.

Complainant respectfully excepts to the finding of the special master under the seventh paragraph of the decree, that "the State of West Virginia received nothing in money from the Commonwealth of Virginia," subsequent to the organization of the Restored Government of Virginia, and for omitting to charge West Virginia with the sums aggregating $170,771.46, paid by Virginia to West Virginia as shown by Plaintiff's Exhibit G-1 (R., p. 819), and the evidence in support thereof (Special Master's Report, pp. 181 and 193).

It will be observed that the master was required by paragraph VII to ascertain and report all money which West Virginia received from Virginia, however or whenever received.

The facts as to the receipt by West Virginia from the Commonwealth of the amounts aggregating $170,771.46 stated in Plaintiff's Exhibit G-1 (R., 819), are assented to and certified by the accountants for both parties, and are reported by the master at page 181 of his report.

Note to the Fifth Exception.

It is proper here to call attention to the fact that the special master has included in the charges against West Virginia, under the seventh paragraph of the decree, the value of the stock which represented the amounts expended by the Commonwealth on the turnpikes and bridges built by the following companies:

Sweet and Salt Sulphur Springs Turnpike Co...	$7,578.00
White and Salt Sulphur Springs Turnpike Co...	4,000.00
Fairmount and Palatine Bridge Co.....	12,000.00
	$23,578.00

The complainant has insisted that the expenditures made by the Commonweath in the construction of these internal improvements should be charged against West Virginia under paragraph III of the decree, and by her first exception above has objected to the master's report for not charging West Virginia with items 60, 136, and 145 of joint Exhibit C-1 (R., pp. 375 and 377), which items cover the expenditures made by Virginia on said Fairmount and Palatine Bridge and on the Sweet and Salt Sulphur and White and Salt Sulphur Turnpikes.

If complainant's first exception is sustained as to those items, the corresponding items charged by the master under paragraph VII of the decree, aggregating $23,578.00, should be deducted from the aggregate charged against West Virginia under said seventh paragraph.

VI. Complainant's Sixth Exception.

In addition to the five exceptions above set forth, complainant respectfully asks that all of the alternative statements contained in the master's report, made at the request of and pursuant to objections interposed before the master by the complainant, and not covered by any of the foregoing exceptions, may be taken and treated as exceptions made by the complainant to said report because of and with respect to the errors of law appearing on the face of said report and of the record returned therewith, in the particulars to which said alternative statements respectively refer.

Respectfully submitted,

NOTE.—The amount of $350,000.00 was not evidenced by any form of certificate of debt prior to January 1st, 1861, but is the principal amount required to produce annually at 6% interest, the sum of $21,000.00 guaranteed forever to the stockholders of the James River Company, by the Act of March 23rd, 1860.

It was later actually funded on this basis under the Acts of 1871 and 1872 known as the "Consol" and "Peeler" Acts.

NOTE.—The word "REGULAR" in Maturity Column below means that the bonds are irredeemable for twenty (20) years, and then at the pleasure of the General Assembly.

The defendant agrees that the amounts shown above are correct, but denies that these bonds formed any part of the outstanding debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia on January 1st, 1861, or that they have since become such a debt; and claims that even if these bonds should be paid in full by the Commonwealth of Virginia, her remedy would lie against the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Co., and not in any case against the State of West Virginia.

THE DIVISION OF THE ORDINARY EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT IS MADE BY THE PARTIES TO THIS CAUSE AS FOLLOWS:

PLAINTIFF:

"The Average Total Population" including slaves is construed to mean the average for each decade determined by averaging the census at the beginning and at the end of that decade. The average total population so found determines the proportion in which the Total Ordinary Expense for that decade is to be charged to the two States. (See page 3 for details.)

The average population and the percentages are as follows:

Between March 19th, 1823 and 1830 (estimated)	Virginia	996,340	85.9789%	West Virginia	162,479	14.0211%
1830 and 1840	"	1,024,871	83.6218%	"	"	200,731	16.3782%
1840 and 1850	"	1,067,304	80.2045%	"	"	263,425	19.7955%
1850 and 1860	"	1,169,489	77.5014%	"	"	339,501	22.4986%

The Ordinary Expenses of Government divided by Decades on the above percentages:

March 19th, 1823-September 30th, 1830, Total	$ 3,367,513.89	Virginia,	$ 2,895,351.40	85.9789%	West Virginia,	$ 472,162.49	14.0211%
October 1st, 1830-September 30th, 1840, Total	5,344,600.21	Virginia,	4,469,250.90	83.6218%	West Virginia,	875,349.31	16.3782%
October 1st, 1840-September 30th, 1850, Total	8,700,443.93	Virginia,	6,978,147.55	80.2045%	West Virginia,	1,722,296.38	19.7955%
October 1st, 1850-December 31st, 1860, Total	20,381,653.15	Virginia,	15,796,066.53	77.5014%	West Virginia,	4,585,586.62	22.4986%
Total	$37,794,211.18		$30,138,816.38			$ 7,655,394.80

"The Average Total Population" excluding slaves is treated in the same manner as above, producing the following:

The average population and the percentages are as follows:

Between March 19th, 1823 and 1830 (estimated)	Virginia	559,399	79.3334%	West Virginia,	145,725	20.6666%
1830 and 1840	"	583,579	76.1625%	"	"	182,650	23.8375%
1840 and 1850	"	626,041	71.9611%	"	"	243,931	28.0389%

The assessed valuation of Slaves for 1860 and 1861, not appearing on the original Assessment Rolls, it is agreed by the parties to this cause that in those counties for which no returns are found for 1862 and 1863, the number of slaves reported for 1860 and 1861 shall be taken and their value estimated on the basis of the average value of all Slaves in counties for which both number and value is reported in 1862 and 1863, making a separate calculation for each State.

Where number of slaves but no assessed valuation is reported in 1862 and 1863 the same average value as above is used.

We hereby certify that the within tables, consisting of pages 5 to 8 following, of which the above is a Summary, are taken from the original Assessment Rolls of the Commonwealth of Virginia, so far as available and from Auditors reports in other cases; that the said Summary is composed of items taken from the latest obtainable authentic sources of information prior to June 20th, 1863, and that the method adopted as above, of valuing the Slaves in those counties for which no value is shown in 1860 and 1861 is fair to both parties.

NOTE: The valuation of slaves for 1860 and 1861 is based on the average assessed valuation of slaves in 1862 and 1863, as shown by the original assessment rolls of counties reporting both the number and value.

Such values are:

For Virginia,	$501.60
For West Virginia,	488.25

Certified Correct:

CLIFFORD E. SCOVILLE, THOMAS BIRD DIXCY,
For the Defendant.

Plaintiff objects to the use of the average assessed valuation of Slaves in 1862 and 1863 as a basis of their assessed valuation in 1860 and 1861, as the Records of the Commonwealth of Virginia clearly show that slaves were assessed in the last mentioned years at 40c per $100 of value and as the tax levied on all slaves over 12 years was $1.20, their assessed valuation was $300; and for the further reason that in 1862 and 1863 the assessed value of the slaves in Virginia was estimated with reference to Confederate money as a standard of value.

We have checked all figures in this exhibit consisting of pages 1, 2, and 3, and find them to be correct.

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1907.

No. 4, Original.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA,
Complainant,

v.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA.

I, CHARLES E. LITTLEFIELD, SPECIAL MASTER APPOINTED UNDER AN ORDER MADE IN THE FOREGOING CASE, RESPECTFULLY SUBMIT THE FOLLOWING REPORT:

PARAGRAPH 1 OF DECREE.

1. THE AMOUNT OF THE PUBLIC DEBT OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA ON THE FIRST DAY OF JANUARY, 1861, STATING SPECIFICALLY HOW AND IN WHAT FORM THE SAME WAS EVIDENCED, BY WHAT AUTHORITY OF LAW AND FOR WHAT PURPOSES THE SAME WAS CREATED, AND THE DATES AND NATURE OF THE BONDS OR OTHER EVIDENCE OF SAID INDEBTEDNESS.

The parties agree to the extent of $32,919,863.93 upon the amount of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia on the 1st day of January, 1861 (Rec., p. 215). The plaintiff claimed at the time of making the joint schedule A-1, p. 1, that there should be added to this aggregate:

First—
Unpaid and accrued interest from July 1st, 1860, to December 31, 1860, on the public debt.....		$ 977,209.89
Second—
Bonds of the Commonwealth of Virginia, held by the Sinking Fund $1,329,557.20
Unpaid and accrued interest as above..	39,686.72
Total		1,369,243.92
Bonds of the Commonwealth held by the Board of Public Works .....$	146,500.00
Unpaid and accrued interest as above..	4,395.00
Total		150,895.00
Bonds of the Commonwealth held by the Literary Fund..	1,085,067.33
Unpaid and accrued interest as above..	31,776.02
Total		1,116,843.35

(Rec., p. 215.)

These items were all in the first instance contested by the defendant. The item of $977,209.89, unpaid and accrued interest, is conceded by the defendant and I treat it as a part of the public debt.

It is conceded that the bonds held by the Board of Public Works were bonds of the Commonwealth placed in its hands for sale in connection with the prosecution of the works under its charge, but that the bonds referred to were never issued, and therefore never became a part of the public debt. For this reason this item has been withdrawn by the plaintiff.

There remains in controversy the bonds in the Sinking Fund and the Literary Fund. Whether the bonds of the State held by these two funds are within the meaning of the Decree, a part of "the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia" is the question. This involves a review of the constitutional and statutory provisions creating them.

Sinking Fund.

The Constitution of Virginia required the maintenance of a Sinking Fund to > "be applied to the payment of the interest of the State debt and the principal of such part as may be redeemable. If no part be redeemable, then the residue of the Sinking Fund, after the payment of such interest, shall be invested in the bonds or certificates of debt of this Commonwealth or of the United States or of some of the states of this Union, and applied to the payment of the state debt as it shall become redeemable."

>
> (Con. Va. Art. 4, Sec. 29, p. 47.)

The sum necessary was to "be set apart annually from the accruing revenues." (Con. Va., Art. IV., Sec. 29; Code Va. 1860, p. 47.) Proceeds of the "sale of the stocks held by the Commonwealth for internal improvement and other companies, if made before the payment of the public debt" were to "constitute a part of the Sinking Fund" (do. Sec. 30). The "Auditor of Public Accounts, Register and Secretary of the Commonwealth for the time being" were constituted a "corporate body under the style of 'The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund.' * * * For the purpose of managing, preserving and applying the Sinking Fund created by this Act." (Code of Va. 1860, Chap. 44, sec. 6, p. 261.) The Auditor of Public Accounts was required, "to pay into the Treasury of the Commonwealth [not the Treasury of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund] annually thereafter out of the accruing revenues" the specified "portion of the sum set apart for the Sinking Fund". He was also required to "pay into the Treasury to the credit of said Fund" the amount of the semi-annual interest. (do. Chap. 44, sec. 4, p. 260). To provide for subsequent debts, he was also required to "pay in like manner into the Treasury", that is, of the Commonwealth, "to the credit of the Sinking Fund, one per centum, &c." and also "in like manner into the Treasury to the credit of the said fund * * * the amount of the semi-annual interest", and in case of coupon bonds, the "amount of the interest" was to be "set apart and paid into the Treasury to the credit of said fund" thirty days in advance of their becoming due. (do. Chap. 44, sec. 5, p. 261.) It was "their duty to apply the moneys appropriated out of the said Fund to the payment of the interest and redemption of the principal of the State debt," &c., and to "invest any part of the appropriations * * * which cannot be so applied to the purchase of public stock" (do. Sec. 7, p. 261). Instalments of interest and sums for the redemption of any part of the principal of the debt were to be paid by special order of the Commissioners entered on their minutes authorizing "the second auditor to issue his warrants on the treasury". (do. Sec. 10, p. 261.) The second auditor was required to "keep the accounts of the Sinking Fund with the Treasury in such manner as to show distinctly at all times the amount of the transactions on account of each appropriate head of receipts and expenditures," (do. Sec. 13, p. 262).

> "All moneys belonging to the Sinking Fund shall be paid into the Treasury on the warrant of the second auditor and shall be paid out in like manner when authorized by the Commissioners of said Fund" (do. sec. 14, p. 262).
>
> "The Treasurer [State Treasurer], shall receive and pay the moneys belonging to the Sinking Fund as herein required. He shall keep a distinct account of the same and report to each session of the Legislature the aggregate receipts and disbursements on account thereof * * *" (do. sec. 15, p. 262).

The Treasurer of the Commonwealth was required to > "keep separate accounts of the money belonging to the Literary Fund, to the Fund for Internal Improvement, to the Sinking Fund and to the Washington Monument Fund, showing the receipts and disbursements on account of each" (Chap. 45, Sec. 31, p. 270).

Semi-annual interest on the debt of 1839 was to "be paid out of the Public Treasury" but no part of it "out of the Sinking Fund," thus recognizing the Sinking Fund as being in the Public Treasury (Chap. 44, Sec. 19, p. 263).

Literary Fund.

By an Act passed March 3, 1819 (Rev. Code of Va., 1819, Vol. 1, page 82), certain public officials were > "constituted a body corporate and politic under the denomination of the President and Directors of the Literary Fund, with power to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, and to hold lands and tenements, goods and chattels, and the same to sell, dispose of or improve for the purposes hereafter mentioned" (Chap. 33, Sec. 6).

and

> "All sums of money which have accrued or may hereafter accrue to the Literary Fund in consequence of the appropriations thereto already, now or hereafter to be made," were vested in said persons (do., Sec. 6).

Actions were authorized to be brought "in the name of the said President and Directors" (do. sec. 7), and in an Act consisting of 22 sections an elaborate plan for the management of the Literary Fund was prescribed.

March 2, 1821, "An Act concerning the Literary Fund" was passed (Acts of Va., 1820-1821, p. 12). It repealed "all acts and parts of acts coming within the purview of this Act," (Sec. 13, p. 14). It changed the personnel of the Board (Sec. 1). It did not vest in them the money which was vested in the original board. It provided "that all moneys accruing for the benefit of the Literary Fund" should "be paid into the public treasury and shall be kept by the Treasurer of the Commonwealth ex officio in the same manner that other public moneys are kept by him except only that there shall be a separate account raised therefor in the name and for the benefit of the Literary Fund" and that it should only "be checked or drawn for in his official capacity as such Treasurer" (Sec. 3, p. 13). The State Treasurer was to "be accountable for the moneys so paid into the Treasury" (Sec. 4). Dividends and interest upon stock belonging to the Fund and interest on moneys loaned were to be "paid into the Treasury" (Sec. 5). Sheriffs collecting executions were "to pay the same into the Treasury" (Sec. 6). "Money belonging to the Literary Fund" could "be paid out of the treasury" only on a "warrant from the auditor drawn in pursuance of an order of the president and directors" (Sec. 7). An accountant was provided for who was required,

> "to keep distinct accounts of all the stock and other property belonging to the Literary Fund and distinct accounts of all monies authorized to be paid into the Treasury and to be drawn therefrom on account of said Fund."

And he was to be furnished by the auditor with > "statements of all warrants for the payment of money into the Treasury for the benefit of the Literary Fund" (Sec. 11, p. 14).

"An Act to amend the several Acts concerning the Literary Fund" passed February 25, 1829 Acts of Va. 1828-9, page 13), provided for a detailed plan for the supervision of the Fund, and Section 13, vested in the second auditor, "The Superintendent of the Literary Fund, all the power heretofore vested in the president and directors of the Literary Fund," with certain exceptions not material, and created a board with certain supervising powers "to perpetuate the corporation heretofore established."

Referring to this corporation the Code of 1860, page 414, provides:

> "The Governor, Treasurer, two auditors and register of the land office shall be a corporation under the style of 'The Board of the Literary Fund' " and be vested with all the rights and powers here tofore vested in the President and Directors of the Literary Fund (Chap. 78, sec. 1). There is no provision in the Code vesting this "corporation" with any title to the funds or property of the Literary Fund. "Any money which ought to be paid into the public Treasury to the credit of the Literary Fund" is to be recovered not by the Board but by the second auditor of the Treasury (do. Chap. 78, sec. 7—Chap. 72, sec. 1). The Board is authorized to > "invest all the unappropriated capital and income of the Literary Fund in certificates of debt of the United States or certificates of debt of or guaranteed by this State or in stocks of banks incorporated by it" (do. sec. 8, p. 414).

It is provided that

> "All money belonging to the Literary Fund shall be received into and paid out of the Public Treasury upon the warrant of the second auditor."

The only control that the Board has over this fund is by virtue of a provision that,

> "no warrant for paying out such money shall be issued without the special authority of the Board" (do., sec. 13, p. 415).

The second auditor adjusts, settles and balances all accounts of persons "having accounts with the Literary Fund" (do. Sec. 14, p. 415). The board does not have the right to the possession of "securities for money belonging to the Literary Fund," as all such securities are to be deposited "with the second auditor for safe keeping" (do. sec. 15, p. 415).

"Money, stocks or other property" are all referred to as belonging "to the Literary Fund" undoubtedly for convenience and identification. (Code Va. 1860, Chap. 79, sec. 1, p. 416.) As the money belonging to this Fund is in the Treasury of the Commonwealth as a part of its common assets kept in "a separate and distinct account," "the money, stocks or other property" would seem for the same reason to be the property of the State in the "Literary Fund."

The Courts of Virginia in a recent case have authoritatively construed legislation of a similar character relating to the Eastern State Hospital, which in its character is more indicative of constituting the Board in question a separate legal entity or a corporation independent of the State than is the legislation relating to the Sinking Fund or the Literary Fund.

By an Act passed March 6, 1841 (Acts of Va. 1840-1841, Chap. 15, page 38), the > "present Directors of the Hospital in the City of Williamsburg" were constituted

> "a body politic and corporate to have perpetual succession by the name of the 'Directors of the Eastern Asylum for the maintenance and cure of insane persons' and by that name may sue and be sued and may and shall have and use a common seal and are enabled to take and hold any estate real or personal given or to be given to the said Asylum or to themselves for the use thereof" (do. sec. 1).

By the Code of Virginia, 1860, Chap. 85, sec. 2, page 435, it is provided that > "The directors for the Asylums at Williamsburg and Staunton shall respectively continue to be corporations," the first being known as the "Eastern Lunatic Asylum."

The name of the hospital at Williamsburg was changed to the "Eastern State Hospital" and it was provided that its directors should continue to be a corporation (Va. Code, annotated, Sec. 1661). Neither of the Codes appear to have changed the powers vested in the corporation. The directors of this hospital are provided for by the Constitution (Art. XI, Sec. 149-150, p. 248). The Board has the "management of the Hospital for which it is appointed" (sec. 1662). Its funds are to be deposited in a "solvent bank" designated by the Board and Commissioners (sec. 1665). Unlike the Sinking and Literary Fund its funds are not to be deposited in the State Treasury. They are "disbursed by checks drawn by the Superintendent of the Hospital and approved and countersigned by the Chairman of said special board" (sec. 1666). This separates the fund of the Hospital from the general fund of the State and the Treasury of the State. The directors have power to release claims for the "removal, maintenance or care of an insane person" (sec. 1708). In addition to the general corporate right to sue originally granted to the board, it has the right to sue "in the name of the hospital or of the Commonwealth" (sec. 1709).

While in this Code the State Treasurer is required to keep separate accounts of the money belonging to the Literary Fund, Interest on the Public Debt and the Sinking Fund, and the Miller Fund, the Hospital Fund is not recognized as being in his hands and he is not required to keep any account thereof (sec. 781).

Eastern State Hospital v. Graves, 105 Va. 151, was a suit brought by the hospital to recover sums due for board and medical services and the question was whether the Statute of Limitations could be pleaded in the suit, it being contended on the part of the plaintiff that the hospital was in effect the State and the Statute of Limitations did not run against the State, and therefore it could not be pleaded; and in holding that the Statute of Limitations could not be pleaded, the Court said that the > "hospital was created and exists for purely Governmental purposes—is a public corpora> tion, governed and controlled by the State and acts exclusively as an agency of the State * * * that it has no stockholders, no members even except directors having no interest in it or its affairs, who are appointed by the Governor and with the consent of the Senate and are in fact public, rather than corporate officials endued with corporate being for a more convenient administration of the duties imposed upon them by law * * * if not collected the loss falls wholly upon the State, and if there is a recovery it will be for the benefit of the State and the State alone—not for the benefit of the directors nor for the benefit of any subordinate division of the State but for the whole people—the State at large" (p. 153).

The same doctrine in substance had been previously announced in Maia v. Eastern State Hospital, 97 Va., 507. The case of Eastern State Hospital v. Graves, expressly overrules the case of McClanahan v. Western Lunatic Asylum, 88 Va., 466, which holds that a plea of the Statute of Limitations was good on the ground that the asylum > "is a corporation—an authorized legal entity —a personality in law with power to sue and be sued" (p. 468),

The McClanahan case seemed to turn almost wholly upon the fact that the Asylum had the power to sue and be sued. It is not only expressly overruled on that point by Eastern State Hospital v. Graves, but inasmuch as neither the Commissioners of the "Sinking Fund" or the "Literary Fund" have the power to sue and be sued, it would not be in point as to those funds in establishing that the respective boards were organized legal entities and personalities in law as distinguished from mere public agencies. This construction given to a state statute by the Supreme Court of Virginia having now become the well settled law of Virginia, will be held to be the authoritative construction of that statute by the Federal Courts as no Federal question is involved.

> Soper v. Lawrence Bros., 201 U. S., 359-370.
> N. Y. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Miller, 202 U. S., 584, 595.

On the authority of that case and by reason of the fact that they have neither stockholders or assets or control over assets and its officers are public, rather than corporate officials, invested with corporate capacity for convenient administration, and the funds are kept in the State Treasury subject to the control of its Treasurer, he being responsible therefor, in separate and distinct accounts for the purpose of convenience in maintaining the identity of and keeping the accounts of its Treasurer with each, I find that these funds are the property of the State.

Bonds purchased by and for either of these funds were bonds purchased by and for and on account of and with the funds of and became the property of the Commonwealth of Virginia, kept for convenience in the accounts to which they respectively belonged.

The remaining question is what was the legal effect upon the "public debt" of Virginia of the purchase of its bonds for each of these funds by the Commonwealth itself.

The plaintiff contends that they have remained after such purchase in the respective funds a part of the "public debt" of the State.

My attention has been called to the case of State ex rel. Heller v. Young, 18 Wash., 21, as sustaining the contention of the plaintiff. In that case the Court held that under an Act authorizing the State Treasurer "to invest all money now in his hands * * * belonging to the Tide Land Fund * * * in the general fund warrants of the state" (p. 23) that the authority conferred was "to purchase and not to pay" (p. 25) the general fund warrants. In the majority opinion the case turned upon the question as to whether the act contemplated "the payment and extinguishment of the warrants" or only authorized "the purchase for the benefit of the tide land fund of such warrants" (p. 24). Three of the Court held that the act contemplated a purchase and that the State could not compel the holder of a warrant to sell it to the State, the case seeming to turn largely upon the question of the power to compel the holder of a warrant to sell it to the State. While inferentially the reasoning indicates the continued existence of the warrant as a part of the debt of the State, its character in that respect is not discussed in the opinion. Two of the Court dissent and Chief Justice Scott in his dissenting opinion says:

> "It is immaterial whether the transaction contemplated an investment, a payment or a purchase. By it the State would become the holder of its own paper to a considerable amount. The original holder would be paid for it would undoubtedly be a payment to him. It might still be an investment upon the part of the State for the benefit of a particular fund. This could make no difference with the prior holder. The warrants would be in effect discharged, for they could not be reissued without express legislative > authority reviving them and directing it. The State might preserve them as evidence of the amounts due a particular fund, which it might at some time desire to replace. * * * The word 'invest' was probably used through a desire to preserve the particular fund as a distinctive one, but these questions are not in this case and do not concern the relator in any way" (p. 32).

thus indicating clearly that the legal effect of the transaction as to whether it did or did not affect the character of the warrant as a continuing indebtedness was not involved in the case, and also clearly indicating that in the opinion of the Chief Justice the purchase of a warrant under such circumstances extinguished it as an indebtedness of the State.

The case of State ex rel. Stull Bros. vs. Bartley, 41 Nebr., 277, is cited by the majority in State v. Young. In that case the Court held that the Constitution had created a trust fund known as the Permanent School Fund, and that an Act providing for the payment of a warrant drawn on the general fund by the Treasurer and also that the Treasurer "shall hold said warrant as an investment of said permanent school fund" was void, as "said Act provides in substance for a transfer to the general fund of the permanent school fund" (p. 283). In the opinion the Court said:

> "We shall not argue to prove that an Act which provides for the defraying of current expenses of the State, and the enforced payment of outstanding general fund warrants from the permanent school fund is a transfer of that fund. The fact that such a transaction is by the legislature denominated an investment is wholly immaterial" (p. 284).

In defining "investment" they said:

> "It implies the contractural relation of purchaser and seller or borrower and lender, and in that sense it is employed in the Constitution" (p. 284), undoubtedly having in mind the relation between the State and the holder of the warrant proposed to be credited by the Act rather than the specific relation of the State itself to its own warrant thus purchased, as they immediately proceed to say:

> "It follows that the State in its relation as Trustee can no more require the holder of State warrants to part with them than it can enforce the sale by a citizen of any other species of property" (p. 284).

While the case is not put upon that ground, it seems to involve the necessary conclusion that the warrants as "State securities" ceased to exist after such payment and although denominated an "investment," by the Act they were not after such purchase a debt or liability of the State, as if they were the "permanent school fund" would still have existed untransferred but invested in the warrants.

In In re State Warrants, 25 Nebr., 659, the Court held that "State warrants drawing interest" were "State securities" within the meaning of the Constitutional provision, authorizing the investment of the school funds in "United States or State Securities" but did not discuss the question as to what the effect of such a purchase would be upon such warrants as a continuing indebtedness of the State.

In State v. Stuefer, 06 Nebr., 381, the opinion of the Commissioner, who was appointed by the Court, seems to treat the proceeding contemplated by the Statute being construed by the Court in In re State Warrants (supra), as a guarantee by the State of the integrity and security of the "permanent school fund," and did not discuss the question as to the effect upon a State security, as a continuing indebtedness after its purchase by the State.

These cases, while in some respects analogous, are not in point upon the contention of the plaintiff.

In Commissioners v. Walker, 7 Miss. (6. How), 143, upon the ground that "There was a legal conveyance of the Sinking Fund to persons capable of holding it for the use and benefit of the State in the extinguishment of a certain debt" (p. 187); the Court held that the Commissioners were Trustees of the Sinking Fund; and as such could maintain the suit to recover money loaned by them from the Sinking Fund "for the use of the party beneficially interested" (p. 188); and did not discuss the question involved here.

The case of Elser v. City of Fort Worth, 27 S. W., 739, is closely in point for the plaintiff. In that case the Court said:

> "The next contention of appellant is that if the City can invest these funds otherwise than in paying off and canceling the bonds themselves it cannot invest them in the purchase of its own outstanding bonds of another series because a purchase by a debtor of a debt against himself ipso facto works a cancellation thereof. It must be conceded that this is a correct statement of the law in its application to ordinary cases in which the purchase is made by the debtor in the same capacity in which he owes the debt; * * *

But, be this as it may, it will hardly be contended that if the purchase be made in a different capacity than that in which the debt is owed (for instance, if A as Trustee should with a trust fund purchase a debt which he owes as an individual), the rule would apply; and we are of opinion that as to those funds set apart for special purposes both by the law and the ordinances passed by the City Council as in this case, the City must be regarded as a Trustee purchasing with the trust fund a debt which it owes as an individual and that the debt so purchased is not canceled but is kept alive for all purposes and becomes the property of the cestui que trust—the special fund—just as the house and lot taken from a defaulting collector was said by our Supreme Court in the case of City of Sherman v. Williams, 84 Tex., 421, 19 S. W. 606, to become the property of such a fund. We think this view receives striking illustration in numerous provisions of our constitution and laws authorizing the investment of special funds such as the university and public school funds held by the State in its own bonds and by the different counties in their own obligations. We believe it has never been contended that a purchase of this kind cancelled the bonds thus acquired" (p. 740).

The Court distinguishes 102 N. Y., 313, and 102 N. Y., 410, upon the ground that they turn upon statutes "quite dissimilar to the provisions contained in the Charter of this City." The Charter provided:

> "The City Council shall have power to invest the sinking fund * * * in bonds of the City of Fort Worth" (p. 741).

An examination of the essential and substantial features of the legislation construed in the New York cases will, I think, show their substantial identity with this provision in the Charter of the City of Fort Worth. The opinion of the Court seems to be mainly predicated upon the analogy of the collector's house and proceeds upon an apparent misconception of the legal situation. The house had physical existence and could be impressed with a trust in connection with the fund without any reference to its ownership or any contractual relations to or interests therein. There is no parallel between such a piece of physical property and the bonds in question. A bond is merely the evidence of an indebtedness and entitles the holder to recover of the maker the amount evidenced by its terms. Independent of establishing the right of such recovery the bond has no value. To assume that it is in all respects parallel to a piece of physical property for the purpose of demonstrating that it still has valid existence as an evidence of indebtedness after its purchase by the maker, is to beg the question and assume its continued existence as a debt. The bond is a promise to pay and the real question is whether the obligation which the City assumed to pay, the sum stipulated in the bond, to the payee, still remains an obligation when the City makes the purchase itself and becomes by virtue thereof the other party to the contract. On the theory of a trust relied on by the Court the debt may well have been extinguished, as a debt, and the proceeds in the hands of the City be impressed with a trust in favor of the fund in which the debt had merged.

This was a decision of an intermediate Court. It does not appear to have gone to the Supreme Court, and I do not find that it has ever been cited with approval.

There are a number of authorities which clearly sustain the contention of the defendants, some of which are directly in point.

In Young v. Hughes, 20 Miss. (12 S. & M.), 93, the State subscribed for stock in the Planter's Bank and paid for the subscription in bonds and provided that the surplus of the dividends on the stock after the payment of the interest of the bonds was to "constitute a Sinking Fund * * * for the redemption of the said bonds" (p. 96) and a State Commissioner was afterwards provided for with power to "manage, collect and receive the Sinking Fund" (p. 98) and authorized to coerce by suit or otherwise payments of all debts due that fund. The fund was held to be the property of the State.

In Miss. v. Dickinson, 20 Miss. (12 S. & M.), 579, the State Treasurer was required to set off the indebtedness of the State to the defendant against the amount the defendant owed the Sinking Fund, notwithstanding the fact that the Sinking Fund was in a sense a trust fund because "an indebtedness to the sinking fund is therefore, an indebtedness to the State of Mississippi, the latter being the sole owner of that fund" (p. 583).

In Comr. of Baltimore Co. vs. Board of Managers of the Maryland Hospital for the Insane, 62 Md. 127, the Board of Managers of the Hospital held the title by deed of "all the real estate and other property belonging to said trust" (p. 130). They were "a body politic and corporate" might "sue and be sued" (p. 131). They had no "power to mortgage or pledge any of the property real or personal of said hospital" (p. 130). The hospital was "declared to have been built and established on its said site by the authority and direction of this State" and the hospital was "to be a public agency of this State for the administration of one of the charities thereof" (p. 131). The Court held that the hospital was the property of the State and not subject to an assessment for the construction of a public roadway and that the "corporate form was adopted by the State only more conveniently and efficiently to administer the affairs of the Institution" (p. 132).

In New England Life Ins Co. v. Phillips, 141 Mass., 535, the Court was deciding the effect of a purchase by trustees of a Sinking Fund, of railroad bonds, which the fund was created to buy, and under the provisions of the Statute they held that it was the duty of the Trustees to cancel the certificates of the road's indebtedness when purchased by them with the Sinking Fund. They said,

> "Now if it were a plain misuse of the term to say 'invested' when preservation for the purpose of collecting income is not intended, there would be some force in the argument. But the word 'invest' has no such absolute and universal meaning. It is not uncommon to hear it said that the best investment of money is in the payment of one's debts" (p. 540).
>
> "but as has already been seen the word 'invest' does not necessarily imply a permanent keeping for income (p. 543). * * * But in the view which we take of the proper construction of the Statute it might reasonably be anticipated that the Trustees though having the liberty to invest in other securities would give the preference to the certificates of indebtedness if these could be obtained at a fair price as compared with the other authorized securites for the purpose of reducing the debt as fast as possible" (p. 544).

While the point is not emphasized, this last remark of the Court indicates that it understood the purchase of securities under such circumstances to result in a reduction of the debt.

In Brooke et al. v. Phila. 162 Pa. St., 123, 24 L. R. A., 781, in considering the debt limit fixed by the Constitution and the relation thereto of the bonds of the city held in its Sinking Fund, the Court said:

"When used in the purchase of the debt, there is a release of the pledge and a discharge of the obligation to the amount of the purchase.

It is not important in determining the actual debt that the Commissioners have not authority immediately on purchase to cancel or destroy the city certificate; it is paid for by the money of the obligor; put into the fund for that very purpose; as an outstanding unpaid obligation, it can as to the obligor have no real effective existence after it is purchased and paid for with the city's money" (p. 131). * * * It "ceases to be longer a part of the actual debt of the city. That much of the debt the City is no longer bound to pay because practically it is paid. We are speaking now of the actual obligation of the city as affected by these certificates in the fund but not yet canceled" (p. 131) * * * "The City owes now just what it is bound to pay; not one cent more. If it has through the Sinking Fund purchased its own certificates, placed them uncancelled in the fund and even pays interest on them annually it can- not pay them again. The payment of annual interest is only a method or device for the annual appropriation to the fund" (p. 132).

The Sinking Fund Act provided for the "extinguishment of the bonds and funded debt" and that "said bonds when purchased shall be conspicuously stamped to show that they were purchased for the Sinking Fund of said City and the interest on said bonds shall be collected and used in like manner with the taxes collected for said Sinking Fund" (Laws Pa., 1874, page 234, Chap. 452, sec. 11), clearly treating the bonds as an existing investment with interest accruing thereon. This case is followed on this point in Bruce et al. v. Pittsburg et al., 166 Pa. St., 152, and in Houston v. Lancaster, 191 Pa. St., 143.

In Kelly v. Minneapolis, 63 Minn., 125, the Court said:

"This Board [Sinking Fund Commissioners] with the consent of the council may invest the fund in the bonds of the city or in certain other designated bonds. If it is invested in the bonds of the city they are not to be canceled but the interest thereon is to be collected and added to the fund; and when the principal of any city bonds becomes due, such of the bonds in the Sinking Fund as may be necessary are to be sold with the consent of the council and the matured bonds paid" (p. 134).

"It appears from the record in this case that all of the bonds held by the Sinking Fund are the bonds of the City, hence the amount of the bonds and the money in the fund necessarily represent an equal amount of the outstanding and uncanceled bonds and indebtedness of the city which has already been realized from taxation to pay the bonds, and to ascertain the further amount to be raised by taxation in order to extinguish the entire indebtedness of the city it necessarily follows that the amount of the Sinking Fund is to be deducted from the entire amount of the apparent indebtedness of the City. The balance is its actual debt. The debt limit of the statute has reference to an actual indebtedness for the payment of which a tax must be levied, not to an uncanceled apparent liability" (p. 135).

In Stone v. Chicago, 207 Ill., 492, it was held that the sum reported as due the Sinking Fund was > "not a debt of the city but the amount in the hands of the City Treasurer belonging to the Sinking Fund should be deducted from the amount of the city's bonded indebtedness * * * *" (p. 510).

Citing with approval Kelly v. Minneapolis (supra). It does not appear from this case whether or not the Sinking Fund was invested in whole or in part in the City bonds.

In Savings Bank v. Grace, 102 N. Y., 313, the Court said:

> "Re-purchase of notes or other evidences of debt by the issuer from the holder is redemption, and is equivalent to and has the force of payment" (p. 319).

Under the law being construed the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund were required to > " 'invest the moneys which shall constitute the Sinking Fund for the redemption of the > city debt * * * in the purchase of stocks created by the corporation of the City of New York' " (p. 321).

The stock was not to be cancelled by them until the final redemption of the stock and all interest accruing thereon was to be regularly carried to the said Sinking Fund for the redemption of the debt, and provision was made for its sale. The Court said:

> "From the time of its inception then to its final redemption it is the subject of sale; at all times the basis of interest, and, in the hands of all owners save the Commissioners, a part of the apparent indebtedness of the city" (p. 323).

Commenting upon a Statute authorizing the Commissioners to cancel the stock they said:

> "Its actual cancellation deprived it of no efficacy, for by redemption it was already for all practical purposes extinguished" (p. 324).

> "But the object of every Sinking Fund is to diminish the debt whose existence warranted its foundation" (p. 325).

In holding that stock thus invested in was not a debt, they said:

> "It satisfies also the intent of the Constitutional prohibition. That is aimed at an actual, not a theoretical indebtedness—at a substantial liability which can be discharged only by the enforcement of a tax or an assessment which when levied will be a charge upon the tax payer and a burden for him to remove—not a formal obligation which may remain as evidence of a once existing debt, but which can in no way be regarded as a present debt to be enforced, and which, if not before cancelled in the discretion of the Commissioners, becomes waste paper by the mere efflux of time" (pp. 325, 326).

> "It is by force of the ordinance that interest is to be credited, not by reason of the contract or the terms upon which the stock was issued. Nor could that interest or other money be applied in payment of the stock held by the commissioners. That was paid by the purchase, yet if the argument of the respondent should prevail, it must be paid again before its extinguishment" (p. 326).

In applying similar principles to a railroad bond, the Court in Wilds v. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. R. Co., 102 N. Y., 410, held that conceding the bonds themselves immediately upon their purchase ceased to constitute any part of the corporate debt and were practically extinguished, and "that the provision for interest payments was only a mode for measuring and determining the amount of prescribed contributions to the Sinking Fund; those contributions at least are directed to be made so long as interest accrues upon the bonds treated as valid obligations" (p. 413).

The case of Savings Bank v. Grace (supra) was expressly approved in the recent and thoroughly considered case of Levy v. McClellan, 196 N. Y., 178, where the Court of Appeals of New York, said:

> "City stocks or bonds so held are not debts which it can be called upon to pay within the meaning of the Constitutional prohibition. * * * 'The object of every sinking fund, it was said, is to diminish the debt whose existence warrants its foundation,' and the amount 'required to pay off the city debt if it all came presently to maturity' would be a sum 'equal to its bonds or stock not including that held by the Sinking Fund' " (p. 197).

The amount of the "public debt" is to be ascertained for the purpose of determining the proportion to be paid by West Virginia. The Sinking Fund by which the bonds in that fund were purchased came from the current revenues raised by taxation in Virginia, while West Virginia was a part thereof, and to those current revenues she contributed her proportion. If the bonds thus purchased by the Fund to which she contributed are to be treated as a part of the existing debt, she will be required to contribute again her proportion in payment thereof and will therefore in effect pay that proportion twice. The bonds in the Literary Fund were purchased by assets that were the common property of the whole State in which West Virginia owned her proportion. The common assets having been used for the purchase of the bonds now in the Fund, if the bonds are still treated as a part of the public debt and in the final adjustment made a charge upon West Virginia, West Virginia will be compelled to pay her proportion of the bonds and lose entirely the benefit of her share of the assets thus used in making the investment therein.

Inasmuch as both the Sinking Fund and the Literary Fund under the provisions of the Statute regulating their conduct and management are very clearly the property of the State and only kept in separate and distinct accounts for the convenience of the State, it is difficult to see how a purchase by the State for either of these funds of its own obligation, does not extinguish the bond as a debt of the State. The State can hardly be debtor and creditor at the same time.

I am satisfied that the great weight of reason and authority is against the contention of the plaintiff, and I therefore find that the Sinking Fund with interest and the Literary Fund with interest, within the meaning of the decree, were not a part of the "public debt" of the Commonwealth of Virginia on the first day of January, 1861, and that the amount of the public debt was the sum of Thirty-two million, nine hundred and nineteen thousand, eight hundred and sixty-three 93/100 dollars ($32,919,863.93) plus the unpaid and accrued interest thereon amounting to Nine hundred and seventy-seven thousand two hundred and nine 89/100 dollars ($977,209.89) in all $33,-897,073.82.

I state as a "special circumstance" that I consider of importance that on the first day of January, 1861, there was held by the Commonwealth of Virginia in its Sinking Fund, bonds of the Commonwealth of Virginia that had been purchased by its funds and were its property in the amount of One million, three hundred and twenty-nine thousand five hundred and fifty-seven 20/100 dollars ($1,329,557.20), and that the unpaid and accrued interest thereon up to December 31, 1860 was Thirty-nine thousand six hundred and eighty-six 72/100 dollars ($39,686.72), aggregating one million three hundred and sixty-nine thousand two hundred and forty-three and 92/100 dollars ($1,-369,243.92), and that the Commonwealth of Virginia held in its Literary Fund bonds of the Commonwealth of Virginia that had been purchased by its funds and were its property, one million eighty-five thousand and sixty-seven 33/100 dollars ($1,085,067.33) with unpaid and accrued interest thereon up to December 31, 1860 of Thirty-one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six 2/100 dollars ($31,776.02) total One million, one hundred and sixteen thousand eight hundred and forty-three 35/100 dollars ($1,116,843.35).

I further state that the Commonwealth of Virginia was liable under a guaranty made in 1847 upon the bonds of the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Co. for the "punctual payment of the interest and ultimate redemption of the principal sum of money appearing due" in the sum of Three hundred thousand dollars. That of this sum, bonds aggregating Thirteen thousand dollars ($13,000) were redeemed by the Commonwealth of Virginia April 11, 1903, in her settlement with the United States for Virginia bonds held by the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of certain Indian tribes, and that the State now holds the same as a claim against the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Company. The sum of Thirteen thousand dollars ($13,000) does not enter in any way into the aggregate of the indebtedenss as above stated (Rec., p. 289).

The schedules hereto annexed and marked Paragraph 1, Ex. 1, Paragraph 1, Ex. 2 and Paragraph 1, Ex. 3, show by what authority of law, and for what purposes the same was created, and the dates and nature of the bonds being the evidence of said indebtedness.

SUMMARY.

Amount of the Public Debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia January 1, 1861, $33,897,073.82.

Stated as a Special Circumstance:

Amount of bonds of Commonwealth held by Sinking Fund, $1,369,243.92.

Amount of bonds of Commonwealth held by Literary Fund $1,116,843.35.

Amount of Bonds Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Co. guaranteed by Virginia in 1847 $300,000.

NOTE.—The word "REGULAR" in Maturity Column below means that the bonds are irredeemable for twenty (20) years, and then at the pleasure of the General Assembly.

NOTE.—The amount of $350,000.00 was not evidenced by any form of certificate of debt prior to January 1st, 1861, but is the principal amount required to produce annually at 6% interest, the sum of $21,000.00 guaranteed forever to the stockholders of the James River Company, by the Act of March 23rd, 1860.

It was later actually funded on this basis under the Acts of 1871 and 1872 known as the "Consol" and "Peeler" Acts.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

At the request of defendants, I make an alternative finding that the population of the counties now forming the State of Virginia, as shown by the census of the United States for 1860, is as follows:

Without slaves,	747,136=67.5864%
With slaves,	1,219,630=76.4027%

And for the counties now forming the State of West Virginia:

Without slaves,	358,317=32.4136%
With slaves,	376,688=23.5973%

The assessed valuation of the territory of Virginia for 1860 was: $293,105,895.55

The assessed valuation of the territory of West Virginia for 1860 was: $83,814,355.61

"Supplemental Ex. 7."

PARAGRAPH III OF DECREE.

3. "ALL EXPENDITURES MADE BY THE COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA WITHIN THE TERRITORY NOW CONSTITUTING THE STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA SINCE ANY PART OF THE DEBT WAS CONTRACTED."

This paragraph is clearly based upon the Wheeling Ordinance, which so far as material, reads as follows:

> "The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State Government since any part of said debt was contracted and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the Treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during the same period" (Appendix to Rec., p. 122).

The Wheeling Ordinance is not predicated upon the amount of the public debt. Upon the assumption that West Virginia would be liable for "a just proportion of the public debt" in case of separation, the Ordinance prescribes an arbitrary method by which that "just proportion" shall be ascertained. It treats the question as an equation involving three factors: first "by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof"; second, "and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State Government since any part of said debt was contracted"; and third, "and deducting therefrom all moneys paid into the Treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during the same period."

The result of this equation was to be a "just proportion" without any reference to the amount of the debt itself. The assumed liability was the occasion of the arbitrary equation, and whether, standing alone, it would result in a "just proportion of the public debt" is so far as the ordinance is concerned entirely immaterial. The ordinance declares that the result thus "ascertained" is "a just proportion." If the ordinance is contractural in its character, it is the agreed method between the States of ascertaining "a just proportion of the public debt." In such case the States would be bound thereby as in case of any other contract.

Next in the order of events comes the Constitution of West Virginia, which upon this point provides:

> "8. An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, shall be assumed by this State" (App., p. 125).

The Court has held that this section is to be read in pari materia with the ordinance. The rules of construction seem to be well settled by the following authorities:

> "The rule is familiar and well settled that in case of obscure and doubtful words or phraseology, the intention of the law makers is to be resorted to if discoverable from the context, in order to fix and control their meaning so as to reconcile it if possible with the general policy of the law" (p. 677).
>
> Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. U. S., 646.

"It seems all sufficiently plain, and in such case there is a well-settled rule which we must observe. The object of construction applied to a Constitution is to give effect to the intent of its framers and of the people in adopting it. This intent is to be found in the instrument itself, and when the text of a constitutional provision is not ambiguous, the Courts, in giving construction thereto, are not at liberty to search for its meaning beyond the instrument. * * *.

So also where a law is expressed in plain and unambiguous terms whether those terms are general or limited, the legislature should be intended to mean what they have plainly expressed, and consequently no room is left for construction" (pp. 670, 671).

Lake Co. Com. v. Rollins, 130 U. S., 662.

"The general rule is perfectly well settled that where a statute is of doubtful meaning and susceptible upon its face of two constructions, the Court may look into prior and contemporaneous acts, the reasons which induce the act in question, the mischiefs intended to be remedied, the extraneous circumstances and the purpose intended to be accomplished by it, to determine its proper construction. But where the act is clear upon its face and when standing alone it is fairly susceptible of but one construction, that construction must be given to it" (p. 419).

Hamilton v. Rathbone, 175 U. S., 414.

"Consequently if a subsequent act on the same subject affords complete demonstration of the legislative sense of its own language, the rule which has been stated requiring that the subsequent should be incorporated into the foregoing act is a direction to Courts in expounding the provisions of the law" (p. 8).

Alexander v. Mayor, 5 Cranch., 1.

"And if it can be gathered from a subsequent statute in pari materia what meaning the legislature attached to the words of a former statute they will amount to a legislative declaration of its meaning and will govern the construction of the first statute" (p. 565).

U. S. v. Freeman, 3 How., 556.

"In cases of doubt or uncertainty acts in pari materia passed either before or after, and whether repealed or still in force may be referred to in order to discern the intent of the legislature in the use of particular terms, or in the enactment of particular provisions" (p. 235).

Vane v. Newcomb, 132 U. S., 220.

The only question that can arise here is as to the application of these rules to the Ordinance and the Constitutional provision read together. I understand a proper application of these rules, at bar, to be that where there is any doubtful uncertain or ambiguous word, phrase or sentence, which is susceptible of two constructions, one of which would operate equitably and one inequitably, that the "equitable" purpose declared by the Constitutional provision requires a construction that would produce the equitable result. Where, on the other hand, the language is clear and unambiguous there is no room for construction, and the clear and obvious meaning is to be adopted. If it is to be held that by reason of the Constitutional provision equitable results should be reached in every instance, notwithstanding the plain provisions of the Ordinance may operate inequitably, the Constitutional provision would in such case in effect eliminate each or every factor in the equation stated in the Ordinance. This would substitute the Constitutional provision for, rather than read it with, the Ordinance. They are to stand and to be read together, the Constitutional provision being invoked only when it is needed for the purpose of interpreting and making certain what is uncertain and ambiguous.

Bearing upon the equitable construction, it is to be observed that both the Ordinance and the Constitutional provision proceed upon the assumption that by the act of separation, West Virginia became liable for a portion of the "public debt of Virginia," which if liquidated before the separation, would have been borne by the citizens of the whole State upon some equal basis. So far as the liability of the State can be predicated upon the citizens constituting the State as distinguished from the State itself, it can be predicated upon either population, territory or property or upon a combination of two or more or all of them. In either case the same proportional liability would rest upon population, territory or property wherever it might be situated. The unit of liability ascertained, each unit would be liable for its pro rata share of the whole debt wherever the unit might be. It would be so liable no matter how the debt might have been incurred or in what section its proceeds might have been expended, or what particular benefit or advantage any particular unit or set of units might have received therefrom. The relation of the units to each other would be joint and indivisible, the debt a common debt and its proceeds expended from a common fund. Each unit was bound by the action of the lawful majority in incurring the debt and expending the proceeds. Any construction that tends to relieve any of these units from their pro rata share of such common liability for the whole public debt would to that extent be inequitable as it must necessarily result in increasing the liability of the remaining units.

The amount claimed under this paragraph by Virginia is $5,639,302.66

(Rec., p. 371, c. 1, p. 1.)

The amount conceded by West West Virginia is..... $1,251,288.92

(Rec., p. 371, c. 1, p. 1.)

The items in controversy are as follows:

Item 2 (Rec., p. 373, c. 1, p. 2)—Covington & Ohio Railroad, $1,146,460.42.

By an Act passed February 15, 1853, the Board of Public Works were made "a body politic under the name of the Covington and Ohio Railroad Company" (App., p. 33). This Company had no capital stock or stockholders or officers except as the Board of Public Works acted as its officers.

By Section 3 it was provided that > "The Board of Public Works shall commence and continue the construction of said road," etc.

By Section 4, the same Board was > "authorized to borrow on the credit of the Commonwealth * * * the money necessary to construct and equip said road."

March 13, 1856, the same Board were > "authorized and directed to borrow from time to time * * * the sum of Five hundred thousand dollars, to be appropriated to the construction of the Covington and Ohio Railroad" (App., p. 34).

A specific provision was made for the manner in which the money was to be expended. March 20, 1858, they were again authorized to borrow for the same purpose under the same restrictions, Eight hundred thousand dollars. (App., p. 34), and on February 29, 1860, the sum of Two and one-half millions. Under these various Acts, it is conceded that prior to January 1, 1861, the sum above mentioned had been expended within the limits of West Virginia.

I find that the sum thus expended was an expenditure by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia prior to January 1, 1861.

Alternative Finding.

At the request of the defendant I find in the alternative that it appears that on February 26, 1866, the Commonwealth of Virginia passed an Act incorporating the "Covington and Ohio Railroad Company" (App., p. 35) and on March 1, 1866, West Virginia (App., p. 37) passed an Act incorporating the same Company. By these Acts upon the performance of the conditions therein specified, the Company was to > "have all the rights, interests and privileges of whatsoever kind in and to the Covington and Ohio Railroad and appurtenances thereto belonging, now the property" of either state (Sec. 2, of each Act).

On February 26, 1867 (App., p. 40) additional legislation to enable the completion of the road and authorizing its consolidation with four other railroads was passed by West Virginia. An Act for the same purpose and with substantially the same provisions, with some immaterial variations, was passed by Virginia March 1, 1867 (App., p. 43). The name of the road was changed by both Acts to the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Company. By section 14, of the latter Act, the Railroad was given the > "right * * * to purchase the stock held by the State in said company * * * to pay any debt which it may owe the State * * * by surrendering * * * bonds for an amount equal to the debt proposed to be paid, and may also purchase the right of the State in and to the Blue Ridge Railroad by the surrender of State bonds to an amount equal to the value of said road, etc." (App., p. 45).

Nothing appears in the Record to show whether any such purchase of stock of the State by the Road was made, nor does anything appear to show whether any debt of the Road to the State was paid. It does appear and I find as a fact that the State of Virginia received in 1870 for the Blue Ridge Railroad from said Chesapeake and Ohio R. R. Co., $625,348.08 (Rec., p. 487).

I find as a fact that the State of Virginia was relieved by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Company of a guarantee of the bonds of the Virginia Central Railroad, amounting to One hundred thousand dollars (Rec., p. 487).

Item 3.—Winchester & Potomac Railroad, $170,532.00.

This item results from an item of $270,000 which consists of $120,000 paid for stock subscribed, and paid for by the State, and $150,000 loaned by the State to the Railroad Company (Rec., p. 489).

It raises the question as to whether the subscribing and paying for stock in an internal improvement company, whose improvements were located within the limits of West Virginia was "an expenditure made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting the state of West Virginia," etc.

It is contended upon the part of the plaintiff that the various improvement companies were merely the method or machinery adopted by the State for the purpose of creating internal improvements, and that as declared by its Board of Public Works,

> "It was not the original purpose of the legislature in creating the fund for internal improvement that the aid to be extended to joint stock companies should be afforded upon the principle of mere money making" (Rep. Bd. of Public Works, Vol. 6, p. 10).

and

> "It must be remembered that these improvements were not fostered by the legislature through contributions in subscriptions and loans merely as investments of so much money in profitable stocks but that they were actuated by a higher consideration, that of promoting the prosperity of the State at large by contracting to build up the local prosperity of its different sections" (Same Vol. 12, p. 8).

and that this being the dominating and controlling purpose these were, within a proper construction of the decree, "expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia," &c., &c.

I have no doubt that the purpose thus declared by the Board of Public Works was the controlling purpose that led the State to engage in these public improvements through the method adopted of organizing joint stock companies and the State becoming a stockholder therein. It is at the same time clear that the element of investment and an expected return therefrom and a belief in the value of the investment was an important element from the beginning. In giving the reasons for adopting this method, the same Board said:

> "Private wealth will of itself take the direction which personal interest prompts."
> * * *
>
> "But it can never be to its [the State] interest, for many reasons, to become the sole proprietor of all the public works within its territory.
>
> Experience testifies that they will be more economically improved and better repaired if the management be left to the individuals who subscribe to their stock, with a view to > private gain, than if confined to public officers or agents. The Commonwealth should subscribe to so much of their stock and upon such terms as will suffice to elicit individual wealth for public improvement" * * * (Rep. Bd. Pub. Works Vol. 1, p. 48).

For the purpose of inducing subscriptions they suggest,

> "By yielding to the individual subscribers the profit of the State on its shares of the stock of any company where required to secure such individuals against temporary loss, a much smaller subscription of the public money will suffice to draw forth private enterprise."

On page 81, they say, after having discussed the failure of the stock of some of the companies to yield an immediate income, that the foundation had been laid that would

> "assure to the Commonwealth a speedy return for such sums as the General Assembly may authorize the Board of Public Works to subscribe out of the funds for internal improvement."

and referred to the method adopted to > "arouse the enterprise and patriotism of their fellow citizens in general to embark their private fortunes in the career of internal improvement."

A report of this Board for 1818 shows that returns were expected from the James River project of Thirty-five thousand dollars per year, and the report for 1819 shows that the stock of the Dismal

Swamp Company and Roanoke Navigation Company were above par, and the Swift Run Gap Turnpike Company had paid from five to ten per cent dividends for several years. In the report for 1831, referring to the completion of the James River Improvement they say that > "A revenue not only sufficient to pay the interest upon the amount of the expenditure but that a surplus greatly beyond it will be realized."

It was the expectation of these profits that justified the Act of 1820 (App., p. 50) under which the State practically took over the property of the James River Company and guaranteed its stockholders 12 per cent. dividend for twelve years and 15 per cent. "forever thereafter."

Substantially all of the Acts, both general and special in their character, authorizing the Board of Public Works to subscribe for stock of the various improvement companies, comtemplated the receipt of dividends on the stock of the State and made specific provision for its disposal and use, recognizing the value of the stock.

Under the Act of 1817, Sec. 32 (App., p. 16) a general provision was made giving the state the prior right to purchase the stock of other stockholders and prohibiting its offer to others until it was offered to the State. In order to induce the investment of private capital in the stock of the companies it suspended its right to dividends upon its own stock until the stock of other subscribers had "netted to them six per cent. per annum" (App., p. 6). Under a Statute passed in 1816 private subscription to 3/5 of the stock was required before the subscriptions were made on behalf of the Commonwealth (App., p. 5). The privilege as to suspending dividends for the benefit of the other stockholders was repealed in 1828 (App., p. 10). While the proportion of stock taken by the Commonwealth was at first 2/5 of the capital, this proportion was changed in 1848, so that in most, if not all of the instances thereafter, the State was authorized to subscribe 3/5 of the capital. (See Acts of 1848, Chap. 196, sec. 3, p. 220.)

The Act of April 9, 1838 (Acts of Va., 1838, Chap. 12, Sec. 3, p. 24), provided for the payment of the interest and final redemption of the principal sum borrowed for the payment of stock subscriptions. It also provided that > "the stock of any joint stock company subscribed for or purchased with the money so borrowed, together with the dividends and other net income which may accrue therefrom to the Commonwealth or to the fund for internal improvement, shall be and the same are hereby appropriated and pledged," &c.,

for the payment of such loans, thus holding out the stock of the Commonwealth with its expected dividends as a security of value as an inducement to investors.

The Constitution of Virginia of 1851 recognized these stocks as the property of the Commonwealth by the following provisions:

> "The General Assembly may at any time direct the sale of the stocks held by the Commonwealth in internal improvement and other companies, but the proceeds of such sale, if made before the payment of the public debt, shall constitute a part of the Sinking Fund and be applied in like manner."

(Art. IV, Sec. 30, Code of Va., 1860, page 47.)

The Board of Public Works was authorized

"when in their opinion the public interest will be promoted thereby, to transfer and convey the State's interest in any turnpike or plank road or any part thereof in the County or Counties in which said road may lie"

(Code Va., 1860, Ch. 61, Sec. 52, p. 365) (App., p. 20);

thus clearly treating the stock as the property of the State. That its interest as a stockholder was the interest referred to appears from the next section, which provides for a transfer of the "interests of the stockholders other than the State."

Section 54 prohibits the transfer of any road that can in their opinion

"be made productive or self-sustaining," and the Act shall not take effect

"until the stockholders other than the State shall have transferred their interest to said County," evidently contemplating that the State was the owner of certain stocks at least that were its property and were of value as assets.

By an Act passed by the Pierpont or Restored Government, Feb. 13, 1863, a formal transfer of

> "all stocks of any other company or corporation the principal office or place of business whereof is located within the said boundaries standing in the name of this State or of the said President or Directors or of the said Board of Public Works or of any person or persons for the use of this State" purports to have been made to West Virginia (App. 128).

The plaintiff in paragraph 8 of its bill of complaint (Rec., p. 8) referred to and recited this portion of the Act of 1863 and alleged:

> "that the property which was by the operation of this Act appropriated and transferred to the State of West Virginia aggregates" several millions of dollars, and > "that of the bank stocks alone which were transferred under the operation of this Act," defendant received

> "from the sale thereof about Six hundred thousand dollars."

The record does not disclose the existence of any stocks other than those in controversy, upon which the Constitutional provision or the Act of 1863 or the allegations of the plaintiff's bill can apparently be predicated.

That the State early appreciated that its legal relation to these various companies was that of a stockholder only, seems clear.

The Act authorizing the subscription to the stock of the Shepherdstown and Smithfield Turnpike Company by the Board of Public Works, passed February 20, 1826 (Acts of Va. 1825-26, p. 66), contains this proviso:

> "Provided that the money hereby authorized to be advanced to said company by taking part of the stock thereof shall be applied exclusively to the completion of said road should any part of it be unfinished when the aforesaid sums of money shall respectively become payable."

A similar act relating to the Petersburg Railroad Company, passed March 22, 1831 (Acts of Va. 1830-31, p. 205), contains a similar proviso:

> "Provided that no part of the stock herein authorized to be subscribed shall be payable until said three-fifth shall have been fully paid and expended by the said company in the construction of the road aforesaid unless at the option of the said Board."

The General Act of February 11, 1832, contains this provision:

> "When the Board of Public Works having made any subscription to the stock of any company shall have good cause to believe * * * that the funds of the company are misapplied or will probably be misapplied, it shall be the duty of the said Board to withhold payment of their subscriptions until proper legal measures can be taken to secure * * * the faithful application of the funds of the company" (App., Sec. 4, p. 18).

The conditions thus imposed by the Commonwealth to enable it to thus indirectly control or dispose of the funds of the corporation is clearly inconsistent with the idea that it had any right to control the assets other than that of an ordinary stockholder, as, if they were within its control, such legislation would have been unnecessary.

The act to amend the Charter of the James River and Kanawha Company, passed March, 1860, clearly recognized the distinction between the rights of the State as a stockholder and a creditor of the Company (App., p. 108).

Code of Virginia, 1860, Chapter 67, Sec. 28, p. 391, authorized the Board of Public Works to purchase > "any work of any internal improvement in which the State is a stockholder, or otherwise interested,"

at a sale

> "by virtue of mortgage, judgment or other lien, * * * on the part and for the use of the Commonwealth" (p. 391).

That the state fully recognized these stocks as investments of value and that its rights were those of a stockholder only, seems clear.

The case of U. S. v. Stanford, 161 U. S., 412, is relied upon as sustaining the contention of the plaintiff. The only question involved in that case was whether a stockholder of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, the California Company, was personally liable as such stockholder for the bonds of the United States "loaned to railroad companies for the purposes indicated in the Act of 1862" (p. 428). The Statutes of California made such stockholders liable for all of the road's "debts and liabilities" (p. 414) the Union Pacific Railroad chartered by Congress and enjoying on the same terms with the Central Pacific Railroad Company the benefit of the bonds, not being so liable. It is true that in the opinion, the Court said:

> "These ends were to be attained through the agency of a corporation created by Congress and of certain corporations organized under State laws which Congress selected as instruments to be employed in accomplishing the public objects specified in its legislation" (p. 427).

I do not understand that by the use of this language the Court intended to be understood as holding that the relation of principal and agent existed between the United States and the corporations in question, or that their property or assets and the right to control the same was in any way changed or affected by reason of their having been selected as such "agency" or "instrument," or that by reason of their having been so selected the United States acquired any control of or interest in the assets of such companies. They were agencies and instrumentalities in the same sense that all public service corporations are instrumentalities and agencies of the State, and only in that sense did Congress extend its aid to these particular corporations to accomplish the objects desired. The opinion in effect so states:

> "The Supreme end sought to be attained was by means of private capital and Governmental aid to secure the construction of the > whole line, for the benefit primarily of the United States and for the use of all the people" (p. 430).

The companies "private capital" was building the road and the Government was simply rendering aid to an "agency" selected by it for that purpose and in that sense only was the road in question the agent of, or instrumentality of, the Government. That the assets of these companies were their own and not the property of the United States was expressly held in the Sinking Fund cases, 99 U. S., 700, where the Court said:

> "It is a matter of no consequence that the Secretary of the Treasury is made the Sinking Fund agent and the Treasury of the United States the depository or that the investment is to be made in the public funds of the United States. This does not make the deposit a payment of the debt due the United States (p. 725)," because as the Court said:

> "While the money is retained it is only that it may be put into the fund which, although kept in the Treasury, is owned by the Company" (p. 726),

and

> "Under the circumstances the retaining of the money in the Treasury as a part of the Sinking Fund is in law a payment to the company" (p. 726).

There is no intimation in the opinion that there was any financial relation existing between the United States and the companies other than that of creditor and debtor or that the money that the companies expended in constructing the road was in any sense, either directly or indirectly, money of the United States or an expenditure by the United States.

I find nothing in the case that justifies the inference that these corporations were agents to apply money put into their hands by the Government to construct the road and were therefore expending the money of the Government therefor.

In Liverpool Ins. Co. v. Massachusetts, 10 Wall., 566, the Court stated the conditions under which joint stock associations will be held to be a corporation within the scope of a Statute which "permits it to exercise its corporate function in that State on the condition of payment of a specific tax," and for the purpose of suits and in some other particulars, such associations have been recognized by the Courts as corporations.

Edgeworth v. Wood, 58 N. J. L., 463.

The following well considered authorities seem to establish clearly the distinction between the State as a stockholder and the corporation as a legal entity.

In Bank of U. S. v. Planters Bank of Ga., 9 Wheat., 904 the State of Georgia was a stockholder in the Planters Bank. The point was raised that the State was a "party defendant." In overrul-ing this contention Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said:

> "A suit against the Planters Bank of Georgia is no more a suit against the State of Georgia than against any other individual corporator (p. 906). * * *
>
> The state does not by becoming a corporator identify itself with the corporation. The Planters Bank of Georgia is not the State of Georgia although the State holds an interest in it.
>
> It is, we think, a sound principle that when a government becomes a partner in any trading company, it devests itself so far as concerns the transactions of that company of its sovereign character and takes that of a private citizen. Instead of communicating to the company its privileges and its prerogatives, it descends to a level with those with whom it associates itself and takes the character which belongs to its associates, and to the business which is to be transacted (p. 907). * * * As a member of a corporation a Government never exercises its sovereignty. It acts merely as a corporator and exercises no other power in the management of the affairs of the corporation than are expressly given by the incorporating act * * * and exercises no power or privilege which is not derived from the Charter" (p. 908).

This case has been frequently approved on this point. (See Rose's Notes.)

In Bank of Kentucky v. Wister, 2 Peters, 318, where the State owned the whole of the stock of the Bank, a case much stronger than the case presented at bar, the Court said:

> "it was insisted that the suit was virtually against a sovereign state," (p. 322).

In affirming 9 Wheat., 904, and holding against the contention, the Court said:

> "But this Court is of the opinion that the question is no longer open here" (p. 322).

In Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 11 Pet., 257, the question was whether the notes of the Bank were bills of credit issued by the State. The State was the sole owner of the stock of the Bank and all private interest was expressly excluded. Its officers were chosen by the Legislature. It was contended that the Bank was the "mere agent of the State." In holding the contrary, the Court said, answering the following question in the negative:

> "The State of Kentucky is the exclusive stockholder in the Bank of the Commonwealth, but does this fact change the character of the corporation? Does it make the Bank identical with the State? And are the operations of the Bank the operations of the State? Is the Bank the mere instrument of the sovereignty to effectuate its designs and is the State responsible for its acts?" (p. 323).

and again:

> "If the Bank of the Commonwealth is not the State nor the agent of the State, if it possesses no more power than is given to it in the act of incorporation and precisely the same as if the stock were owned by private individuals, how can it be contended that the notes of the Bank can be called bills of credit in contradistinction from the notes of other banks?" (p. 326).

See Rose's Notes for approving citations and also Curran v. Arkansas, 15 How., 304.

This question seems to have been clearly settled by the Courts of Virginia.

The case of James River & Kanawha Co. v. Early, 13 Gratt., 541, was an action to recover for the negligence of the corporation. In discussing the question of the liability of the Company, the Court said:

> "It is not a public corporation representing the public and administering public funds for the benefit of the public, but it is a joint stock company which has undertaken the construction of a work, useful to the public certainly, but intended for the private emolument of the stockholders in dividends of the profits" (p. 552).

> "That the State owned a large interest in the stock of the company will not vary the case * * * a mere interest taken by the Commonwealth in the stock would not be sufficient to bring an action against the company for neglect of its corporate duty within the influence of the decision in the case of Sayre v. The Northwestern Turnpike Road, 10 Leigh, 454 * * *" (p. 553).

This case is clearly in line with the decisions of the United States Supreme Court upon the relation of the State to a corporation. These corporations were not "administering public funds for the benefit of the public."

It seems to me clear that the relation of principal and agent did not exist between the State and these corporations in which it was a stockholder. While in a popular general sense they may be termed the machinery, instrumentality or agency through which the State operated in making the particular disbursement, they were such agency, machinery and instrumentality in the same sense that they were the agency, machinery or instrumentality of the other stockholders, or perhaps, in the added sense in which every public service corporation is the agency, machinery or instrumentality of the State. The State held two-fifths or three-fifths of the stock, but had no more control over the funds of the company, or any more title to the assets of the company, than any other stockholder holding a like amount of the stock. Like other stockholders it was an investor with the same rights and privileges. It may be said that as a matter of public policy, in a general way, the State was in this manner, indirectly, at least, making an expenditure, and no investment can be made without an expenditure. This case must be determined, however, by well-recognized legal rules. The language of the decree is plain and unambiguous. To hold these subscriptions thus made for investment to be expenditures by the State "within the territory" it would be necessary to read into the decree the words "either directly or indirectly" which I do not feel at liberty to do.

I find therefore that the sums in question in case of the joint stock companies in which the State was a stockholder were expenditures made by the respective companies from their own funds and not by the State. I therefore disallow the sum of $120,000, subscribed and paid for stock in the Winchester & Potomac Railroad Company by virtue of the Acts of 1832 and 1833 (App., pp. 28 and 29).

By an Act passed February 13, 1838 (App., p. 29), the Board of Public Works were > "directed to loan on behalf of the Commonwealth * * * to the Winchester & Poto> mac Railroad Company * * * upon the condition that the salaries of the officers and servants of the said company shall not be directly or indirectly increased during the existence of this debt", and upon

> " a mortgage upon the whole property, real and personal, and upon the net income of all their tolls and receipts"

the sum of $150,000. Specific provision as to security was made. Acceptance of the loan gave the Legislature " a right to tax the stock, property and profits" of said Company, and the Company was required to pay off all prior liens so as to make the mortgage of the State a first lien (App., p. 30).

This is clearly a loan with specific and careful provision made to secure its repayment, and was so intended by each party thereto. I therefore disallow the item.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

At the request of the plaintiff under this item, I make the alternative finding:

First.—That $120,000 was subscribed and paid by the Commonwealth for stock in the Winchester and Potomac Railroad under the Act of 1832, and Second.—That the sum of One hundred and fifty thousand dollars, with specific provision to secure its repayment with interest thereon was loaned by the Commonwealth to said Railroad under the Act of 1838, and that the portion of the road in West Virginia was 63.16%.

As a special circumstance that I consider of importance, I also find that an Act was passed February 24, 1846 (App., p. 30), providing for an annuity of $5,000 in lieu of interest upon the debt due by said Company to the Commonwealth, and all dividends upon the stock of the Commonwealth in said company. So long as the annuity was paid, "the payment of the principal of said debt shall be so long postponed" (App., Sec. 2, p. 31). If default were made in payment "the whole of said debt and interest due" are to be collected (Sec. 3) and the lien for the whole debt and interest was fully retained (Sec. 4).

February 22, 1866, the Company was authorized "to pay into the Treasury of the Commonwealth" $83,333.33 (Sec. 1, App., p. 31). Payment could be made in State bonds at their par value, and when made the "claim of the State against said Company shall be lifted and discharged." Under this Act there was paid into the Treasury of the State in bonds and interest in 1866, $118,518.12 (Rec., p. 462).

Item 6.—Berryville & Charlestown Turnpike Company, $11,932.52.

This sum was paid upon a stock subscription and is therefore disallowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff that the Commonwealth subscribed and paid for stock in said road under Acts of 1849 and 1850 $20,455.74, and that 58 1/3% of the road was in West Virginia.

Items 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 all relate to the Kanawha Turnpike and the Kanawha River Improvements.

An Act was passed February 17, 1820, relating to the James River Company (App., p. 50). In its preamble it declared that that company was willing to consent to such modification of its charter as would enable the company

> "as an agent acting and holding in trust for the benefit of this Commonwealth to undertake and carry the said improvements into effect in such manner as the General Assembly shall from time to time direct and require, and under the direction and superintendence of such agent or agents as may from time to time be appointed for that purpose by appropriating to these objects such sums of money as they may borrow," &c., upon the condition that the company would consent to applying its surplus tolls and income

> "to the payment of the interest on the money which they may so borrow," except so much as might be necessary to pay a dividend on the present stock of the company of twelve per cent. for twelve years and fifteen per cent. forever thereafter. It was stipulated

> "that the General Assembly shall provide for making good any deficiency in the payment of the interest on any money so borrowed which may remain to be provided for > after applying the surplus tolls and other income of the said company with the exceptions aforesaid to the payment of interest as aforesaid" (App., p. 51).

It was provided that upon its acceptance by the Company, the Act should be > "considered a compact between this Commonwealth and the said company" and while subject to change and modification, no such change and modification should be made

> "as will take from the James River Company their right to the dividends or any part of the dividends upon their stock allowed to them by this Act" (App., p. 51).

The improvements contemplated were to be "prescribed by the Legislature" and should from time to time be made under the superintendence of the Commissioner or Commissioners, agent or agents as the General Assembly should from time to time appoint. It was provided that the works of the Company > "shall forever thereafter be esteemed and taken as public highways for the transportation of all goods, commodities and produce whatsoever * * * and the road, canals, locks dams and other works when perfected with all tolls, and other profits and emoluments arising therefrom shall be and the same are hereby vested in the said company as agents in trust for this Commonwealth" (App., p. 53);

and in Section 10 the company was referred to as, after giving their assent,

"holding as an agent in trust for the benefit of the Commonwealth."

Repairs were to be

"contracted for and made by the Company from time to time under the control, direction and superintendence of the Commissioners on the part of the Commonwealth" (App. p. 56).

Commissioners were provided for, and no contracts were to be made by the Company for the improvement of the Kanawha River and Road until the same should be submitted to and approved in writing by the Commissioners, named to superintend the works on such River and Road (do. p. 56). All contracts for making any improvements on the James and Jackson River were to be "submitted to and approved in writing by the Commissioners" (do. p. 56).

The Treasurer of the State was made ex officio the Treasurer of the Company. Money was to be borrowed "as the General Assembly shall hereafter direct" (do. p. 57). Certificates issued for money borrowed were "to be redeemed only at the pleasure of the General Assembly."

The surplus of such tolls and other incomes after the "payment of the expenses, dividends and interest as aforesaid shall from time to time be paid into the Treasury of this Comonwealth to the credit of the fund for Internal Im> provement, to be disposed of as may from time to time be directed by law" (do. p. 58).

By an Act passed February 24, 1823 (App., p. 64), a much more pronounced change in the character of the legal relation was made. All of the powers and duties of the existing President and Directors were "superseded and annulled." Certain officials of the State were made ex officio the President and Directors of the Company and they succeeded to and possessed

> "all the rights, powers, duties and privileges of the existing President and Directors" (do., p. 64), except so far as may be otherwise directed by the provisions of the act. All of the moneys were to be > "kept in the public treasury separate from other public moneys" (do., p. 65).

The funds raised and used were to be paid into and disbursed from the Public Treasury (do., pp. 65, 66 and 67). Commissioners were created with powers to carry into effect the provisions of the Act (do., pp. 67 and 68). They were to appoint such "engineers, managers or agents" as they might think necessary and remove them at their pleasure. Provision was made for carrying out the contracts made by the Company "as if the powers of the said company had continued" (do., p. 69). Its superintendents and officers were to continue until > "superseded by appointments under this Act or their offices annulled by the provisions thereof" (do., p. 69).

These and numerous provisions show that the State by virtue of these two acts had in effect acquired title to all the property of the company. The Acts were so construed in the case of Higginbotham Exr. v. The Commonwealth, 25 Grattan, 627, where the Court said, in describing the relation of the State to the Company:

> "Here then we have a solemn 'compact' between the State and the Company. * * * Such was the solemn obligation assumed by the State as the price of the stockholders' property" (p. 628).

and referring to the Act of March 16, 1832:

> "On that day, however, a new company with greatly extended powers was chartered called the James River and Kanawha Company, to which all the interest of the State in the old James River Company was transferred" (p. 628).

The record does not disclose when, and what for, or how, these items were paid. In order to supply the deficiency of proof in this regard, I have had recourse to the notes of the accountants and report as a part of the case so much of their notes, agreed to by them, as relates to these items as "Supplemental Exhibit I."

I find by these notes that of Item 10, $152,130.54, the sum of $149,491.90 was expended by the State "within the Territory" after March 19, 1823, and before March 16, 1832, on the Kanawha Turnpike Road. There is nothing in the record to show when the actual transfer by the State was made under the provisions of the Act of March 16, 1832. I find that the sum of $2,638.64 was expended by the Commonwealth after March 16, 1832, but was an actual expenditure, not an investment or a loan, and I therefore allow the whole sum of $152,130.54 as an expenditure.

I find that Item 11, $2,593.92 was expended by the Commonwealth "within the territory" upon the Kanawha after December 31, 1834, and that it was an actual expenditure by the State and not an investment or a loan, and I therefore allow it as an expenditure.

I find that Item 12, $7,189.65 was also expended by the Commonwealth "within the territory" upon the Kanawha Turnpike after December 31, 1834, and was an expenditure and not an investment or a loan and I therefore allow the item.

I find that under Item 13, the Commonwealth expended after March 13, 1823, and prior to March 16, 1832, "within the territory" upon the Kanawha Turnpike, $3,202.53 and that the State expended "within the Territory" upon the same turnpike, the sum of $77,752.75, after March 16, 1832 ($49,935 of which was on account of contracts made and services rendered prior to March 16, 1832); that the whole sum was an expenditure by the State and not an investment or a loan and I therefore allow the whole sum.

As to Item 14, I find that the amount of $59,572.36 was all expended by the Commonwealth within the territory after March 19, 1823, and prior to March 19, 1832, and I therefore allow the same.

Alternative Finding.

As an alternative finding at the request of the defendant I find that the State was to transfer

> "her whole interest in the works and property of the present James River Company to the James River and Kanawha Company in payment for its subscription for 10,000 shares of stock" (App. p. 87).

There is nothing in the record to show whether this transfer was actually made. It does not appear whether there was a general meeting of the stockholders upon which the transfer was to be made.

Item 15—Kanawha Board bonds, $60,000.

I find that this was a loan of $60,000 in bonds to the James River and Kanawha Company under the provisions of the Act of March 23, 1860, sec. 9 (App. p. 110) which authorized a loan for $300,000 to the James River and Kanawha Company upon a "deed of trust or mortgage upon the works, property and net revenue to the Commonwealth for the payment of the principal and interest of said $300,000." It was also provided that such lien

> "shall take precedence over any lien created by said company to secure their bonds authorized to be issued by this Act."

Under this Act, $60,000 was loaned (Rec., p. 490).

There is nothing in the record to show whether it has or not been repaid, although counsel for West Virginia stated at the argument that he did not think it had been repaid.

This was a clear loan with careful provisions made to secure and a reasonable expectation of its repayment, and I therefore disallow it as an expenditure.

ATERNATIVE FINDING.

I find, as an alternative finding at the request of the plaintiff that the sum of $60,000 was loaned to the James River and Kanawha Company by virtue of the provisions of the Act of March 23, 1860, sec. 9 (App., p. 110), and that the loan has not been paid.

Item 17, $7,882.92 was withdrawn by the plaintiff upon the ground that the portion of the road charged for was wholly in the State of Maryland.

Item 25,—Brandonville, Kingwood and Evansville Road—$10,595.73

Item 28, Clarksburg & Buchanan Turnpike, $19,259.36.

Item 35, Kingwood and West Union Turnpike, $18,140.61, are all for macadamizing (Rec., p. 451).

In the case of the Brandonville, Kingwood and Evansville Road, the State although a small stockholder therein, paid out the sum independent of its interest as a stockholder (Rec., p. 480).

By an Act passed March 18, 1853, the Board of Public Works were directed > "to have such parts of the Clarksburg and Buchannon Turnpike Road macadamized or planked as they may think stand in need of such improvement" (App., p. 140).

By an Act passed February 28, 1853, $28,000 was appropriated for the purpose of macadamizing the Kingwood and West Union Turnpike and the Board of Public Works was authorized > "to pay the said appropriation as is provided by law" (App. p. 143).

These were not investments or loans. They were sums directly expended by the State upon the public improvements owned by these companies to be sure, and while the expenditure no doubt increased the value of the properties the expenditure was in my judgment made by the State, for the sole purpose of promoting the public convenience, and were not intended, so far as anything disclosed in the record shows, as gratuities to the companies involved. I therefore think they come fairly within the scope of an expenditure and allow them as such.

Item 53—Harpers Ferry Raid—$189,718.59—

I think that "an expenditure within the territory" in question means expenditures that are local in their character; that are localized by the subjects upon, or for, which they are expended, and the benefits which enure from such expenditures are benefits that the territory in question received the benefit of, it remaining therein, as distinguished from the rest of the State outside of that territory, the result of which in case of physical property remained within the territory after the expenditure had been made, not expenditures the benefit of which were common to all of the people of the State irrespective of the localities in which they resided. These expenses do not appear to me to come within the scope of such an expenditure. The only benefit the "territory" derived therefrom was the same benefit that it derived in common with the rest of the State. It was not an expenditure made for the benefit of that particular "territory." The money was appropriated and paid "for the Defense of the Commonwealth" (App., p. 149) not for any particular part of the Commonwealth. I therefore disallow this item as a direct expenditure.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

At the request of the plaintiff I find that the Commonwealth paid on account of the Harpers Ferry Raid that occurred "within the territory" of West Virginia, the sum of $189,718.59.

Item 54—School Commissioners—$830,865.37.

This amount is claimed by the plaintiff as an expenditure "within the territory" out of a total of expenditure for like purpose in the whole Commonwealth of $3,056,239.84 (Rec., p. 538-H).

The Constitution of Virginia directed that > "One equal moiety of the capitation tax upon white persons shall be applied to the purposes of education in primary and free schools" (Con. Va. Art. VI. Sec. 24—Code Va. 1860, p. 46).

February 21, 1818, an annual appropriation of $45,000 for the education of poor children was made.

This was increased to $70,000; and in 1851 to $75,000 and to $80,000 in 1853-4 (Code Va. 1860, p. 417, note). The sum expended by Virginia for primary schools was a regular, current, annual and permanent charge upon the State by virtue of Constitutional and Statutory provisions. Being thus a permanent requirement of its fundamental law it was an expenditure that the State was bound to make annually and was a part of "ordinary expenses of the Government." It was an expenditure general in its character, not confined to or appropriated to any particular district and as much a general charge as the expense of the Judicial or Executive branches or the Board of Public Works which are treated by both parties as ordinary expenses; I therefore disallow the item as an expenditure.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

At the request of the plaintiff I find that the sum paid the School Commissioners "within the territory of West Virginia" was $830,865.37.

Item 55, Surveys—$106,416.14.

This item comes from an aggregate of $250,-206.56. An analysis of this sum shows by a statement agreed to by the accountants, which is reported as a part of the case and marked "Supplemental Ex. 2," that the sum of $106,983.67 was for expenditures that were general in their character (such as a salary paid by the State to the Chief Engineer $30,809.73, &c.), and the proportion charged to West Virginia of that sum was reached by a percentage based upon the sum that was actually charged upon the books in the different sections, so that the general charge would be in proportion thereto. This left $143,222.89 that was actually charged upon the books of the State and could be traced into each section; the sum that was thus charged and was thus traceable that was expended in the territory of West Virginia was $60,873.19. While it is a narrow and close question, I think the general charge should be deducted from this item and charged under ordinary expenses as they were regular, ordinary and current expenses of a branch of the State Government and general in their character, not allocated to, or apportioned to, any particular territory. It is suggested that many of these surveys were not productive of result, no roads being built. It might also be said that the roads, if built, proving worthless, might have been abandoned. None the less the money would have been expended. No road could be built without the preliminary survey, and if the initial expense, disclosed the unwisdom of proceeding further, it seems to me it was no less an expense properly incurred whether the survey was or not followed by construction and does not affect the fact that the money was expended in that locality for a legitimate purpose. A direct expenditure for the work is treated by both parties as an "expenditure" and for the same reason the survey preliminary to and, if constructed, a necessary part of, the work is also an expenditure. The sum which this branch of the Government actually expended "within the limits of the territory of West Virginia," $60,873.19 I allow as an "expenditure."

Item 56, Trans-Allegheny Lunatic Asylum, $27,000.

It was conceded that on January 1, 1861, this sum was in the hands of the Treasurer of the Asylum unexpended. The record, p. 452, should read "and had not been expended." It was to be used in completing its building. (Rec., p. 471) It was on deposit with the Weston Branch of the Exchange Bank of Virginia and was taken therefrom by the so-called Pierpoint or Restored Government. (Wheeling Acts, Extra Session, July 1, 1861) (App., p. 135) On that date $5,316.98 was "placed at the disposal of the Board of Directors of the Lunatic Asylum" and by an Act passed January 14 , 1862, the sum of $21,684 (making with the previous sum $.98 more than the $27,000) was appropriated to the Lunatic Asylum to be expended in > "completing the South wing of said building being the balance of the amount taken from the branch of the Exchange Bank of Virginia at Weston" (App., p. 136).

Under the authority of Eastern State Hospital v. Graves (supra), this money thus in the hands of the Treasurer of the Asylum, prior to its being taken by the Restored Government, was the property of the Commonweatlh, and while it was intended to be used in the completion of the buildings, it had not been so used, and had not therefore been expended on January 1, 1861. I therefore disallow this item.

Alternative Finding.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff that $27,000 was in the hands of the Treasurer of the Asylum the property of the Commonwealth on or before January 1st, 1861, for the purpose of being expended in the completion of its buildings and that it was afterwards taken therefrom by the Restored State of Virginia, and returned to the Asylum—$5,316.98 July 1, 1866, and $21,684 January 14, 1862.

Items 57 to 65 inclusive.

These are all for sums paid by the Commonwealth on account of stock subscriptions in Bridge Companies, aggregating $78,412.50, and are disallowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff that $78,412.50 was actually paid by the Commonwealth on account of its subscriptions to the stock of the various Bridge Companies mentioned in said items, and that all of the bridges were located "within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia."

Items 66 to 69 inclusive.

These are all for sums paid by the Commonwealth on account of stock subscriptions in navigation companies aggregating $210,500. and are disallowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff that $210,500 was actually paid by the Commonwealth on account of its subscriptions to the stock of the various navigation companies mentioned therein and that the property of all of the companies was located within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia.

Items 70 to 147 inclusive.

These are all for sums paid by the Commonwealth on account of its stock subscriptions to the various turnpike companies mentioned therein, aggregating $803,555.83, and are disallowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff that $803,555.83 was actually paid by the Commonwealth on account of its subscription to the stock of the various turnpike companies mentioned therein.

The property of all of these companies except those mentioned in items 70 to 80 inclusive is "within the territory now constituting West Virginia" and aggregates $700,103.49. A portion of the property of the companies mentioned in items 70 to 80 inclusive is in part within those limits. Apportioning the total amount paid to the amount within those limits would give the sum of $103,-452.34.

Items 148 and 149, $391,800.

These are for sums paid by the Commonwealth on account of its stock subscriptions to the banks mentioned therein, and are disallowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff that $391,800 was actually paid by the Commonwealth on account of its subscription to the stock of the banks therein mentioned, and that they were located "within the limits of the territory now constituting West Virginia."

Item 150—Loan to the Town of Bath $2,500.

March 8, 1847, an Act was passed,

> "to provide for the construction of a road from Bath in Morgan County to the mouth of the St. John's run on the Potomac."

The Board of Public Works was authorized

> "to pay from time to time out of the fund for Internal improvement a sum or sums of money not exceeding $2,500 to the Treasurer of the Trustees of the Town of Bath * * * for the purpose of constructing a road from the town of Bath to the mouth of St. John's run on the Potomac."

The Treasurer was to > "pay or deliver such sums as may be required from time to time" and he was to be liable for any defaults therein "as for other defaults upon his official bond," anticipating the question that might be raised that in the relation thus created the money received by him would not be the town's money and he be liable therefor as its Treasurer (App., p. 155, Sec. 1). The Act provided that the Trustees were to have "the disposition of the money" and to exercise the same powers as the "president and directors of turnpike companies." The Board of Public Works were to prescribe the tolls "such tolls to be applied to the necessary expenses and repairs of the road" (do., Sec. 2). The surplus after the payment of the > "necessary expenses and repairs of the road" was

> "to be applied in payment of the interest on the sum paid on the part of the Commonwealth for the construction of said road"

and

> "Any deficiency of the net surplus of tolls to pay said interest may be paid from the receipts on account of bathing at the medicinal springs belonging to the Commonwealth in said Town of Bath" (do., sec. 2).

In Section 3, it was provided that no part of the appropriation should be advanced

> "until the said Trustees shall have given bond with good security payable to the said Board [not to the Town of Bath] and approved by them for the punctual payment of interest annually on the sum advanced by the Commonwealth for the construction of said Road."

Except for the provisions of Section 3, it is not perceived how the Town of Bath or its trustees would have assumed any responsibility or liability of any kind in connection with the sums used for the construction of the road, except their faithful disbursement. It had no power to fix the tolls. The trustees were not responsible to the city for the expenditure of the money. It was not the money of the city. There is no intimation in the Act that the Town of Bath or its trustees was to return the amount the State expended or any part or it, or that indicates that the State ever expected it to be returned. In every instance where the State made a loan to which my attention has been called, specific and detailed provisions for security and repayment have been made. The Act must be read as a whole, and so reading it, the only liability assumed by the Town of Bath was to make good any deficit in interest that might exist, after exhausing for each payment, first the surplus of tolls after the payment of the "necessary expenses and repairs of the road" and second, "the receipts on account of bathing at the medicinal springs belonging to the commonwealth in the Town of Bath." That this has not been a very great burden appears from the fact that while nearly 13 years had elapsed the town had paid during that time for that deficit the sum of $750, less than 3% per annum.

It is earnestly insisted that the fact that the auditor of Virginia described this as a loan in his report, that both accountants so described it in their joint schedules and that the act is printed in the appendix under the heading "Loan to the Trustees of the Town of Bath," should be given determining weight in establishing its character as a loan. It is believed that the Act itself and not the manner in which some one has characterized, or described it, must control. It is difficult to conceive of a loan in which the sum loaned is not under some contingency to be returned, an essential element wanting in this instance. It is also difficult to conceive of the beneficial ownership of a public work the use of which the owner has no right to control. This was not an investment or a loan and comes fairly within the scope of an expenditure "within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia" and is allowed as such.

SUMMARY.

I find that the expenditures made by the Commonwealth of Virginia within the territory now constituting West Virginia are as follows:

1.	Amount agreed upon by both parties	$1,251,288.92
2.	Covington & Ohio R. R.	$1,146,460.42

ALTERNATIVE FINDINGS:

At the request of defendant.

The Commonwealth received on account of the Blue Ridge Railroad in bonds and interest.... $625,348.08 and was relieved from a contingent liability upon a guarantee of... $100,000.00

3. At the request of the plaintiff, the Commonwealth subscribed and paid for capital stock of the Winchester & Potomac Railroad Company, to the extent of. $120,000.00

The Commonwealth loaned to the said company $150,000.00

Upon the basis of mileage, the proportion of these sums that would be chargeable to West Virginia, is $170,532.00

I state as a special circumstance important to be taken into account that as a result of legislation predicated upon both the stock and loan that the Commonwealth had in this Road, there was paid into the Commonwealth in 1886, the sum of.. $118,518.12

6. At the request of the plaintiff, that the Commonwealth subscribed and paid for stock in the Berryville and Charlestown Turnpike Co. and upon the mileage basis of 58 1/3 per cent. the amount chargeable to West Virginia would be..... $11,932.52

15. At the request of the plaintiff, that the Commonwealth loaned to the Kanawha Board of its bonds ..... $60,000.

56. At the request of the plaintiff, that $27,000 was in the hands of the Treasurer of the Trans-Allegheny Lunatic Asylum, deposited in the Weston Branch of the Exchange Bank of Virginia, unexpended, January 1, 1861, which was afterwards taken from the Bank by the Restored Government of Virginia and subsequently returned to the Asylum.

At the request of the plaintiff, that in the various bridge companies, located in West Virginia. Items 57 to 65, inclusive, the Commonwealth subscribed and paid for stock $78,412.50

That in the various navigation companies located in West Virginia Items 66 to 69, inclusive, the Commonwealth subscribed and paid for stock..... $210,500.00

That in the various Turnpike companies, Items 70 to 147, inclusive, all of which were in the territory now constituting West Virginia, the Commonwealth subscribed and paid for stock..... $803,555.83

700,103.49 of which was wholly in Virginia and $103,452.34 was West Virginia's portion in case of companies partly within her limits.

That in the two banks mentioned in Items 148 and 149, within the territory now constituting the State of West Virginia the State subscribed and paid for stock $391,800.00

At the request of the defendant, I find that the sum of $2,500 was invested under circumstances where the trustees of the Town of Bath assumed a contingent liability, only, of paying the interest upon the sum expended by the State, after the tolls remaining from the operation of the road after the payment of 'necessary expenses and repairs" and profits received from the operation of a spring, were applied thereto, and that this was the only liability that the trustees of the Town of Bath assumed in connection with this expenditure of..... $2,500.

PARAGRAPH IV OF DECREE.

4. "SUCH PROPORTION OF THE ORDINARY EXPENSES OF THE GOVERNMENT OF VIRGINIA SINCE ANY OF SAID DEBT WAS CONTRACTED, AS WAS PROPERLY ASSIGNABLE TO THE COUNTIES WHICH WERE CREATED INTO THE STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA ON THE BASIS OF THE AVERAGE TOTAL POPULATION OF VIRGINIA, WITH AND WITHOUT SLAVES, AS SHOWN BY THE CENSUS OF THE UNITED STATES."

This paragraph involves the determination of the question as to what expenses are to be included within the term "ordinary expenses of the Government of Virginia.

The defendant contends that the language should receive a construction that would make "ordinary" synonymous with "necessary" or "essential" used in the sense of indispensable expenses,—expenses which if not paid the wheels of Government will cease to revolve, without the payment of which the State Government cannot be administered.

Whenever I use the term "essential" in the discussion, I shall use it in the sense of being indispensable. I have made an exhaustive examination of the cases where state or municipal expenditures have been under consideration or in which reference has been made to them. I find there are very few cases that attempt to define the term "ordinary expenses." The term does not appear to have been used with much precision unless it is to be held to be in fact synonymous with "current" or "necessary." There are many cases that use the terms "ordinary" and "current" interchangeably as though they were synonymous and attention does not appear to have been called to the question as to whether or not there is any distinction between them. They are here cited:

Under the authorities heretofore cited it would seem to be clear that the courts treat the terms

"ordinary" and "current" when applied to the expenditures of a state or a municipality, as synonymous.

The great question in this case is whether interest on the public debt is an "ordinary expense."

The defendant relies upon the line of cases where judgment creditors seeking to recover payments from the revenues of the municipality have been postponed to ordinary, current or necessary expenses, which are made a primary charge upon revenues. The cases clearly establish the general doctrine. From some of them it might perhaps be inferred that interest was not a primary charge or an ordinary, current or necessary expense. I find none of them however where the specific question as to whether interest is or not an "ordinary expense" is discussed. It is very clear that all essential expenses are also "ordinary expenses," but it does not by any means follow that all "ordinary expenses" are essential expenses, that there may not be "ordinary expenses" which are not essential expenses. If it were true that judgment creditors were postponed only to essential or indispensable expenses, the cases might be entitled to considerable significance. On the contrary, however, the postponing of judgment creditors is not confined to essential or indispensable expenses, as expenses which do not come within that class, are often held to be primary in their character and to precede judgment creditors as a charge upon the current revenues.

The following cases show that such current or ordinary expenses as light, water and fire protection, none of which are essential to the revolution of the wheels of government, have been held to be ordinary or current expenses that will be made a charge upon the revenues prior to the claims of judgment creditors thus demonstrating that the essential character of the expenditure is not the test of an "ordinary expense."

> "the support and maintenance of public schools is not an essential municipal function" (p. 482), they would treat it as a "current expense of administering the municipal government" (p. 482).

Sherman v. Smith, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 580-582-3.
Laycock v. Baton Rouge, 35 La. 475-81.

In Sherman v. Smith (supra) the Court recognized the fact that expenses for fire, water and lights were not essential but held that they were a part of the current expenses and preferred to judgment creditors.

> "we may consider that they could be dispensed with and an efficient City Government conducted without them" (p. 583).

Expenses for fire, water, lights and repairs and construction of bridges, are held in the following cases to be ordinary or current expenses:

Valpariso v. Gardner, 97 Ind. 1.
Brown v. Corry, 175 Pa. St. 528-32.
Voss v. Waterloo Water Co., 163 Ind. 69-88.

McKethan v. Com. Cumberland, 92 N. C. 243.
Livngston v. Pippin, 31 Ala. 542-50.

It would seem that the term "necessary town charges" was at least as exclusive and restrictive as "ordinary expenses," and yet it has been frequently held that under that designation, many expenses can be properly incurred, that cannot be held to be essential, or indispensable, to the operations of the government.

The Statutes of Maine authorize, after specifying a variety of purposes for which funds can be raised, the raising of taxes for "other necessary town charges."

In Gale v. South Berwick, 51 Maine, 174-6-7 in defining that provision the Court said:

> "They embrace all incidental expenses arising directly or indirectly in the due and legitimate exercise of the powers conferred upon towns. Accordingly they have ever received liberal construction."

Clocks, repair of fire engines, construction of reservoirs to supply water, building a market house and town halls were cited as illustrations of the proper exercise of the power. In answering an inquiry from the Governor and Council the Court defined this clause as follows:

> "The words 'other necessary town charges' * * * embrace all incidental expenses arising directly or indirectly in the due and legitimate exercise of the various powers conferred by statute."
>
> Opinion of Justices, 52 Me. 598.

In Massachusetts, under a Statute authorizing a tax for "other necessary charges," the Court held that > "towns might raise such sums as should be necessary to meet the ordinary expenses of the year" and that the > "erection of public buildings for the accommodation of the inhabitants, such as town houses to assemble in, and market houses for the sale of provisions may also be a proper town charge and may come within the fair meaning of the term necessary; for these may be essential to the comfort and convenience of the citizens."

>
> Stetson v. Kempton, 13 Mass. 271-8.

Under this clause towns can indemnify officers in the bona fide discharge of their duties.

> Bancroft v. Lynnfield, 18 Pick. 566.

and build a public hall—

Wheelock v. Lowell, 196 Mass. 220.

These cases clearly extend the scope of necessary town charges beyond those which are absolutely essential or indispensable to the orperations of government. Great stress was laid in the argument upon the part of the defendant upon the particular language of the decree which requires a finding of the "ordinary expenses of the Government". The Ordinance upon which the decree is predicated reads in this particular: "the ordinary expenses of the state government". The language of the decree so far as there is any distinction is less emphatic if regard is had to the technical language used, the word "state" being omitted, but it is improbable that any significance is to be attached to the omission, and very doubtful if the Court had in mind in making the decree the distinction contended for. The argument is that the ordinary expenses are confined to the expenses of "the state government" or of "the government" as contradistinguished from what might be termed in a broader sense state or municipal expenses. The contention being that there are expenses which are proper expenses, on the part of the state that the not essential, or indispensable, to the operations of the Government, and that the language of the ordinance and the decree mean that the ordinary expenses "of the government" or "of the state government", are essential expenses, and thus limit the ordinary expenses, to such expenses, as are indispensable to the operations "of the state government."

I find that similar language has been frequently used in the opinions, without attributing to it the technical and restrictive meaning contended for by the defendant. It has quite clearly been used as synonymous with state or municipal expenses generally rather than as restricting the term to essential expenses.

In White v. Mayor & Council of Decatur, 119 Ala., 476, the court referred to current, legitimate municipal expenses and in the same paragraph referred to the same expenses as "governmental expenditures" (480) and "current expense of administering the municipal government" (p. 482) evidently meaning the same thing. The Court expressly held in that case that while the support and maintenance of public schools are not an essential, municipal function, they would treat is as a necessary "governmental expenditure" as that function was "vested in the Mayor and Council of Decatur" by statute and the "power and duty" were "in and upon them".

In Anniston v. Hurt, 140 Ala. 394, 400, the Court referred to "necessary expenses of administrating the municipal government" and "the object of corporation expenditures" and "expenses for governmental purposes" and "expenditure for administration of governmental purposes" and "necessary current expenditures" as apparently meaning one and the same thing. The question of what was or was not an "ordinary expense" did not arise in that case, and the Court discussed the question as to whether interest was or not a necessary current expenditure as a question depending upon the construction of the particular statutes being discussed.

In City of Erie, 91 Pa. St. 398, the Court referred to "ordinary expenses of the City Government" (p. 403) without indicating that they were confined to expenses indispensable to the operations of the government.

In Corpus Christi v. Woessner 58 Tex. 462-7, the Court referred to ordinary, "current expenses of her local government" in the same connection in which they speak of current and ordinary expenses, and without a suggestion of any distinction between governmental and current or ordinary expenses.

In Nougues v. Douglas, 7 Cal. 65-7-8, the Court referred to "ordinary expenses of the state government" and "ordinary expenses of the state" and "the expenses of the state government" and the necessary and "ordinary expenses of the state" and the "ordinary expenses of government", evidently meaning the same thing in each instance.

In Weinstein v. Newburn, 71 N. Y., 535, 536, the Court speak of "current expenses of the city government" and "the necessary current expenses" clearly meaning the same thing.

In Sherman v. Smith, 12 Tex. Civ. App., 580, 583, the court likewise referred to "her current and ordinary expenses" and then "for the payment of expenses of government," and "proper current expenses" (p. 584) all meaning the same thing. In Wilson v. Charlotte, 74 N. C., 748, 749, the Court referred to "the necessary expenses of the government of a city" (p. 759) clearly meaning "necessary expenses of the year," and with the same meaning the Court in Mills v. Richland, 72 Mich., 100, 107, said "necessary expenses incurred in administering the government of the township." So in Herman v. Oconto, 110 Wis., 666-678, the Court said "such as are necessary to carry on the city government."

The frequency with which this language has been used by the Court with its general signification would seem to indicate that the language of the decree is hardly entitled to the technical construction relied upon by the defendants.

Did the framers of the ordinance have in mind any distinction between "ordinary expenses of the state government" and ordinary expenses of the Commonwealth? What distinction is there between them in their relation to a "just proportion of the public debt"? Are they not each equally a common burden paid from a common fund for the common benefit? What reason is there that would require the inclusion of one that would justify the exclusion of the other?

Moreover, the defendants concede as ordinary expenses items which do not appear to be essential to the revolution of the wheels of government.

(Defts.' original Ex. D 1.)

There are very few cases undertaking to give anything like a definition of what "ordinary expenses" are, and perhaps with but one exception none of those are very closely in point on the question of interest, though a number of them give definitions broad enough to include interest.

In East St. Louis v. U. S., 110 U. S. 321, the Court in discussing the general question of municipal expenses said:

> "That fund by the terms of the Charter of the City under which the bonds were issued is authorized for the purpose of paying the necessary, current expenses of administration not including payments on account of the bonds of the municipal corporation" (p. 324).

The fact that the Court found it necessary to exclude specifically from the scope of "necessary current expenses" bonds of the municipal corporation gives rise to some inference at least that they understood that without such exception such bonds would be fairly included within the term "necessary current expenses." If payment on account of bonds was included interest on the bonds would also be included.

In Wilson v. Charlotte, 74 N. C., 748, the Court said:

> "It would be difficult or impossible to draw a precise line between what are and what are not the necessary expenses of the government of a city. The analogy of the law of necessaries for infants is the only one that occurs to us. It is held, that if, considering the means and station in life of the infant. the articles sold to him may be necessaries under any circumstances, they come within a class for which the infant may be liable, and upon his refusal to pay, it is for a jury to determine whether under the actual circumstances they were necessary. If, however, the articles are merely ornamental, and such as cannot, under any circumstances be necessary to one of the means and station of the infant, a Court may, as matter of law, declare that the infant is not liable. We do not undertake to say that this analogy will furnish a rule which will admit of a close application, but if treated merely as an analogy in the absence of other guides, it may be of some general use (p. 759).

In Brown v. Corry, 175 Pa. St., 528, the Court said:

> "The ordinary expenses, at least many of the ordinary expenses, must be incurred and paid or the city cannot exist. * * * And any expense that recurs with regularity and certainty and is necessary for the existence of the municipality, or for the health, comfort and perhaps convenience of the inhabitants may well be called an ordinary expense" (p. 531).

In Mills v. Richland, 72 Mich., 100, the Court said:

> "What shall be deemed as the ordinary expenses of a township is a question which has never received any very satisfactory answer, and it would be difficult to glean one from what has been said in this Court. I think, however, it may well be said the answer can never include less than the necessary expenses incurred in administering the Government of the Township under the Statutes creating it and relating thereto, in such manner as will best promote the convenience, peace, health, prosperity and happiness of the people residing therein. This would, as has been held by this Court in Marathon v. Oregon, 8 Mich., 382, include the payment of the indebtedness to the Township of Mills" (pp. 106-7).

It seems that the Town of Richland had been set off from Mills and this was an action to recover a portion of the debt due from Richland to Mills. The opinion in Marathon v. Oregon above cited, proceeds upon the peculiar language of the statute being construed. It authorized the Township > "to vote such sums as they may deem necessary for defraying all proper charges and expenses arising in the Township" (p. 381).

and the Court held that both charges and expenses were included in the term ordinary township expenses, saying

> "It is certainly no violation of terms to class the payment of debts ascertained among ordinary expenses" (p. 382).

In Smith v. Dedham, 144 Mass., 177, 180 the Court seemed to make annual payment the criterion as they held that an annual payment for water for a period of five years was "for a sum of money to be paid annually, among the other current expenses of the town."

In Livingston v. Pippin, 31 Ala., 542-50, the Court gave this definition, "Ordinary expenses are the expenses which are necessary to carry into effect the ordinary powers of the corporation. * * * Under the rule above laid down, the implied and incidental powers of corporations must be classed as ordinary powers"

In Herman v. Oconto, 110 Wis., 660, the Court said:

> "It cannot be said with any show of right that the building of a sewer system is a current expense. While it is not easy to accurately define what may be included under that head still it is plain that it must be limited to such as are necessary to carry on the city government—such as are usual and ordinary from year to year" (p. 678).

The case of State v. Leaphart, 11 S. C., 458, is very closely in point. All three of the judges wrote opinions, and all concurred in holding that interest was an ordinary expense. C. J. Willard, in his opinion, said:

> "Ordinary expenses include the current expenses of the government and debts to mature during the current fiscal year" (p. 469).

> "* * * to such purposes as properly fall within the description of 'ordinary expenses of the government,' that is to current expenses and debts maturing during the fiscal year" (p. 471).

He held that the Act being construed could only be regarded as a general annual tax levied for ordinary expenses, and ordered a mandamus to issue for the payment of the interest on the public debt out of the tax as an "ordinary expense." Haskell, J., said:

> "When bonds have been issued to raise money to meet an 'extraordinary expenditure' they become a standing liability of the State, and the interest as it falls due becomes an 'ordinary expense' to be included within the 'estimated expenses,' to make up the amount to be levied annually and appropriated annually" (p. 477).

and again

> "The only difference between the interest on such bonds and any other annual expense is, that the interest is made by the Constitution, an obligatory expense, while many other expenses may be at the option of the legislature" (p. 477).
>
> "The tax is levied for the expenses of the current fiscal year. The objects to which the tax must be applied are the items contained in those estimated expenses. Expenses include the payment of recognized indebtedness as well as any outlay that the Legislature may deem proper to make during the year" (p. 478).

The case showed that > "The Act of 1876-7 provides for the payment of the current expenses of the govern> ment and certain indebtedness matured or to mature. It is therefore clearly a general tax levied as such, entirely subject to the control of the legislature provided the purposes to which it is appropriated fall within the general class of 'ordinary expenses' " (p. 471).

The mandamus was prayed for among other things to secure the payment of interest falling due Jan. 1, 1879. McIver, Judge, who dissented upon one point held that the relator was entitled to a mandamus for the interest for that year.

This case was cited with approval in State v. Derham, 61 S. C. 258, 262. The plaintiff relies upon In re Limitation Taxation, 3 S. D. 456 where the Court said:

> "The 'ordinary expenses' of the state are practically defined in Section 2, Art. 12 of the Constitution and are the 'ordinary expenses of the executive, legislative and judicial departments of the state, the current expenses of the state institutions, interest on the public debt and for common schools' " (p. 460).

An examination of the Constitutional provision thus referred to discloses the fact that it does not purport to define "ordinary expenses" but simply provides that > "The general appropriation bill shall embrace nothing but appropriations for ordinary expenses of the executive, legislative and judicial departments of the State, the current expenses of the state institutions, interest on the public debt, and for common schools" (Con. Art. 12, Sec. 2).

So far as this case has any weight, it tends to negative the contention of the plaintiff. Properly considered it gives no definition and incorrectly states the effect of the constitutional provision. It is contended upon the part of the plaintiff that the term "ordinary expense" is flexible in its character and is to receive a construction in harmony with the circumstances and conditions under which it is used. It was urged in argument upon the part of the defendant that it was in a sense analogous to the term "necessaries," the analogy used by the Court in the case of Wilson v. Charlotte (supra). If it be true that the analogy exists, it would clearly establish the flexible or varying character of the meaning of the term, as it is too clear for the citation of authorities that necessaries may include articles in connection with one individual that would be clearly excluded when applied to another individual. Ordinary expenses involves the payment of at least current indebtedness. There may be some parallel between an expense and a debt. It has been frequently held that the word debt "has no fixed legal signification, as has the word 'contract,' but is used in different statutes and constitutions in senses varying from a very restricted to a very general one."

McNeill v. Waco, 33 S. W. R., 323 (supra).

Swanson v. Ottumwa, 118 Ia., 161-171 (supra).

The case of Union Pac. R. R. v. U. S., 99 U. S., 402, was relied upon by the defendant, so far as applicable. The Court were there discussing the question as to what would be the net earnings as distinguished from the gross earnings of a railroad company, and they said:

"As a general proposition net earnings are the excess of the gross earnings over the expenditures defrayed in producing them, aside from, and exclusive of, the expenditure of capital laid out in constructing and equipping the works themselves. It may often be difficult to draw a precise line between expenditures for construction, and the ordinary expenses incident to operating and maintaining the road and works of a railroad company. Theoretically, the expenses chargeable to earnings include the general expenses in keeping up the organization of the company, and all expenses incurred in operating the works and keeping them in good condition and repair; whilst expenses chargeable to capital include those which are incurred in the original construction of the works, and in the subsequent enlargement and improvement thereof. With regard to the last mentioned class of expenditures, however, namely, those which are incurred in enlarging and improving the works, a difference of practice prevails amongst railroad companies. Some charge to construction account every item of expense, and every part and portion of every item, which goes to make the road, or any of its appurtenances or equipments better than they were before; whilst others charge to ordinary expense account, and against earnings, whatever is taken for these purposes from the earnings, and is not raised upon bonds or issues of stock. The latter method is deemed the most conservative and beneficial for the company, and operates as a restraint against injudicious dividends and the accumulation of a heavy indebtedness" (pp. 420-1).

So far as this case has any significance it seems to establish the proposition that the term ordinary expense has no fixed and arbitrary signification; that it may include at one time what would be excluded at another time. The Court in that case adopted the broad construction, on the ground that it was the "wisest and most prudent method," and was what they called "a liberal application of the earnings to the improvement of the works."

If the case of City v. Leaphart (supra) is to be treated as an authority, the interest would clearly be an ordinary expense.

If current or ordinary expenses are the converse of current or ordinary revenue, then interest in this case would be an ordinary expense, as it was expressly provided for in the current or ordinary revenues, and made mandatory by the constitution.

In the classification adopted by the United States Treasury Department (Rep. Sec. Treas., 1874, pp. IV and V, do. 1904, House Doc., 58th Cong., Vol. 31, p. 5), and by the United States Census Office (11th Census, Vol. 50, pt. II, pp. 418-19, 464-77, 516-553, 556-7), and the State of Ohio, Rep. Bureau Insp. and Sup. of Pub. Off. of 1906, pp. 72-79, interest is classified as an "ordinary expense." It is so held by Bastable on Public Expenditures, pp. 130-3.

There are several important considerations to be taken into account in determining this question:

First.—The cases of judgment creditors seeking to secure payment out of the ordinary or current revenues of a municipality are certainly not directly in point. This is not a controversy between a judgment creditor and a municipality. It does not involve the question as to whether, if a claim against the municipality were allowed, there would still remain sufficient current revenues for the payment of either the indispensable or the ordinary and current expenses of the state. It is a question between two parties who were jointly interested in the incurring of a joint liability and the question to be determined is what proportion of this joint liability is to be assumed by each. This is the question whether it be reached under the Wheeling Ordinance or under the general principles of International Law. There is therefore no warrant for applying the strict construction that would be applicable in the case of an action by a judgment creditor.

Second.—The Constitution of Virginia makes the interest upon the public debt a specific annual charge upon the revenues:

> "There shall be set apart annually from the accruing revenues a sum equal to seven per cent. of the State debt existing on the first day of January in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two. The sum thus set apart shall be called the Sinking Fund and shall be applied to the payment of the interest of said debt and the principal of such part as may be redeemable."
>
> (Con. of Va., Art. IV, Sec. 29, Code Va., 1860, p. 47.)

With this specific Constitutional provision requiring "the interest of said debt" to "be set apart annually from the accruing revenues," it may well be doubted whether if this were an action by a judgment creditor against the state, the Courts would not be required by the constitution to postpone such creditor to the payment of interest on the ground that it was not only an ordinary expense, but was a specific constitutional security, annually to be set apart for the benefit of the state's creditors, which would be preserved inviolate for the benefit of the holders of the interest on its public debt.

Third.—Under the provisions of the Ordinance, the defendants are to be charged with the amounts expended within the limits of West Virginia. In order to make these expenditures Virginia hired the money and has paid the interest thereon. If interest is not an ordinary expense, West Virginia would be charged with the principal sum thus hired and expended, but would not be charged with the sums thus paid by Virginia for the use of the money thus hired and expended. If the money thus hired and expended is a proper charge it is upon the theory that Virginia should be reimbursed therefor, and no reason is perceived why she is not on general principles, as much entitled to be reimbursed the sums, that she has paid for the use of the principal sum, as she is to be reimbursed for the principal sum itself. No good reason has been suggested why, as a matter of equity, if liable for the principal sum, West Virginia is not also liable for interest thereon. Unless allowed as an ordinary expense, she will not pay any part of the interest, and the whole burden of the payment of interest, will be assumed by the State of Virginia, a result which would be clearly inequitable.

It is not an adequate answer to say that the Commonwealth has had the use of the improvements, because these improvements are local in their character, and so far as the public use of them is concerned, that use has been confined to the limits of West Virginia. If allowed as an ordinary expense, the portion of the Commonwealth that has derived the local benefit from the use, would also assume the burden of paying its proportion, for the use of the money thus expended, otherwise, the remainder of the Commonwealth which has had no benefit from the use, would be paying for the use of all the money thus expended. If tolls were received by the Commonwealth from any of the public improvements, on account of which expenditures are charged, each portion of the Commonwealth has received its pro rata benefit therefrom. The disbursements made by the Commonwealth during this period came from three sources, loans, income and taxation. As the income increased or decreased, the sums raised by taxation necessarily decreased or increased, each section receiving in accordance with the proportion of the burden it was assuming, its proportional benefit of the income, thus received. Just how a "just proportion" of the ordinary expenses is to be ascertained does not appear, but in reaching the conclusion as to what an ordinary expense is, I must assume that it will be ascertained upon a proper basis, and that every legitimate consideration tending to determine the "just proportion" will be given due weight.

That the term "ordinary expense" is not fixed and definite, but is more or less flexible and varying in its meaning, is, I think, reasonably well settled by the authorities.

If, as used in the decree, it is of doubtful meaning, and is open to two constructions, one of which would produce an equitable result, the reading, with the decree, of the constitutional provision requiring the assumption by the State of an equitable proportion of the debt, would require the doubt to be resolved in favor of the equitable result.

It seems to me upon reason and authority that the interest upon the public debt of the State of Virginia is "one of the ordinary expenses of the Government of Virginia" within the meaning of the language of the Wheeling ordinance and the decree predicated thereon.

Extraordinary Expenses.

The question as to what is an "extraordinary expense" seems to be well settled.

In Supervisors v. U. S., 18 Wall, 71, 79, the Court referred to aid in the erection of buildings as "an extraordinary expenditure."

In Union Pac. R. R. v. U. S., 99 U. S., 402, the Court referred to expenses for the "enlargement and improvement" as capital expenses.

In South Bend v. Reynolds, 155 Ind., 70, 73, the Court held that > "While the rent for suitable offices for city officers is an ordinary and necessary expense, the erection of a city hall or a building for the use of the city officers is not in any sense an ordinary expense, but is an extraordinary one."

In Voss v. Waterloo Water Co., 163 Ind., 69, 85, the Court held that the construction of water works or an electric light plant > "is not in any sense an ordinary and necessary expense, but an extraordinary one."

because such an expense involved

> "municipal ownership of the water and light plant, the means of furnishing said water and light, and is an extraordinary expense."

In Brown v. Corry, 175 Pa. St., 528, 532, the Court said:

> "I can see a very clear distinction between 'a contract for the supply of water and one for the means of furnishing the supply.' The one may pertain to an ordinary expense, and the other, if it involves municipal purchase and ownership of the means of furnishing the supply, can only pertain to an extraordinary expense."

See also Grant v. Davenport, 36 Ia., 396, 403.

In Book v. Earl, 87 Mo., 246, 256,

> "Remodelling and building three new additions to the Court House" was held not to be an ordinary expense but an extraordinary expenditure.

In Mills v. Richland, 72 Mich., 100-6-7, the expenses of "establishing lost section corners" and "building a town hall" were held not to be included within the term "ordinary expenses."

In Helena Water Co. v. Helena, 31 Mont., 243, the Court held that the installation of a water plant was not a "current expense" as it was an expense that partakes of the nature of an investment, or such as are to be incurred in a substantial or permanent improvement.

It seems to be well established that the construction, "enlargement and improvement" of a plant are a capital investment, an extraordinary expense, and that its maintenance and operation is an ordinary expense. It is not perceived that there is any substantial distinction between the increase of the size of the plant and amount of the investment and the original construction or the original investment. If it is construction, addition to plant, "enlargement and improvement;" an investment, and not maintenance or operation, then it is an extraordinary expense.

The parties agree upon items making up an aggregate of the ordinary expense of government of $18,207,684.29 (Rec., p. 515). They reach this amount by deducting from an aggregate of receipts, of $18,761,154.51, the sum of $553,470.22. This sum is the result of eight items. Deft. original Ex. D-1 p. 4.

No. 1. Tobacco Receipts.

The seven items following the tobacco item are evidently of the same character and should be treated in the same manner, but for an admission of the plaintiff. The plaintiff admits them as credits, not because they are proper items of credit, but only for the purpose of reaching an agreement as to the amount of that schedule, and the propriety of treating the tobacco item as a credit, is not to be affected by that admission. If the tobacco item is not a proper credit, it is to be added as an ordinary expense to the sum of $18,207,684.29, agreed upon, as in reaching that sum it has already been deducted, and the charge will offset the credit. Virginia made elaborate provision for the inspection of tobacco. It contemplated first adequate protection to its great industry, and second, revenue. The law specifically provides that the salaries of the inspectors "are to be paid out of the receipts for inspection at such warehouse, and in no case is the state to be charged therewith, or with any other expense of such warehouse" (App. 157). The state in fact paid nothing on this account. The whole amount collected, $389,694.91, was reduced by the sum of $36,570.95 for expense of commissioners, refund, and paid for burnt tobacco and the balance, $353,123.96, was paid into the treasury. This sum was not an expense of any kind. It was a receipt, and was not predicated upon an expense. I have authority to state disbursements only, not receipts. For the reasons above given I treat it as an ordinary expense, and add to the agreed sum, $353,123.96.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

At the request of the defendant, I find that the Commonwealth received during the period prescribed from tobacco receipts the sum of $353,-123.96.

Item 2—Constitutional Conventions, $258,906.-28.

The fact that the decree requires a finding of the "ordinary expenses of the Government of Virginia" raises the necessary inference that there are expenses other than ordinary. Such expenses are both legitimate and proper but do not come within the definition of ordinary. Ordinary is defined by the Century Dictionary as "of the usual order, usual, customary, common", and by Webster as "2. Common, customary, usual." Anderson's Law Dict.: "common, usual, reasonable." These definitions come fairly within such definitions as the Courts have given and to them may be added such as recur with regularity and certainty. The only question to be determined is whether the various items claimed by the plaintiff are usual, customary, common, recurrent, annual or regular in their character.

There have been two Constitutional Conventions during the period covered—one in 1829 and one in 1850 (App., pp. 159-160). That these conventions were a legitimate and proper exercise of a governmental function and that the expenses attendant thereon are both legitimate and proper is unquestionably true. It certainly cannot be considered as a usual, customary, regular or common expense. It does not come within the scope of an ordinary expense within the meaning of the decree and the item is disallowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I make an alternative finding at the request of the plaintiff that there was actually expended by the Commonwealth for expenses attendant upon two Constitutional Conventions, held in 1829 and in 1850, the sum of $258,906.28.

Item 3.—Slaves transported and executed, $311,168.35.

This item is admitted by the defendant.

Item 4—Boundary lines $16,704.78.

These boundary lines were run under the authority of specific acts of the legislature passed in 1822, 1833, 1847, 1858 and 1860 (App., pp. 166-171). Nothing appears in the record to indicate that this expenditure was one that could be called usual, customary, common, regular, or annual. On general principles the expense incurred in settling a boundary line could hardly be expected to recur so as to be in any proper sense, usual or customary. I disallow the item.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I make an alternative finding at the request of the plaintiff that under the acts of the legislature above referred to, the Commonwealth actually expended in running boundary lines, $16,704.78 within the time prescribed.

Item 5—Maps (Commonwealth)....	$16,628.04
" (Board of Public Works)	11,446.48
	$28,074.52

The maps of the Commonwealth appear to have been made by virtue of the provisions of the statutes enacted in 1825, 1828, 1836, 1848 and 1853 (App. pp. 172-175). These acts all relate to specific maps for specific purposes, and none of them indicate that the work is to be one of a continuing character, usual, customary or common. The maps provided for once prepared, the office of the legislation was apparently accomplished.

I disallow the item.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiffs that the Commonwealth expended under and by virtue of the various acts of the legislature above referred to for maps, within the time prescribed, the sum of $16,628.04.

As to the item of $11,446.48, for maps for the Board of Public Works, I think a different rule applies.

It is conceded that the salaries and expenses of the Board of Public Works are an ordinary expense. It was a great and important branch of the government exercising control over its expenditures and discharging responsible duties involving a great many details. It is hardly to be expected that each item of expense incurred by this Board in the discharge of its duties would be duplicated or repeated so as to become as to that item usual, customary or continuing in its character.

Yet all the expense incurred by the Board in the proper discharge of its duty would be properly incurred and within the contemplation of the legislation creating the Board as a continuing body and investing it with its duties and responsibilities. Its expenses should be treated as a whole. All expenses that were reasonably necessary to the proper discharge of its duty are proper expenses, and should be included as a part of its aggregate of expenses and are, I think, fairly within the scope of the ordinary expenses of the Board. Maps for their use in the development of public improvements were such an expense, and I therefore allow the sum of $11,446.48 as a part of the ordinary expenses of the Board of Public Works, and therefore a part of the "ordinary expenses."

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find at the request of the defendant that the sum of $11,446.48 was expended by the Board of Public Works within the time prescribed for maps for its use.

Item 6—Deaf, Dumb and Blind Institution, $80,661.94.

The details making up this item are found on pages 521-522, 523, Joint Ex. D-1, pp. 5, 6 and 7.

All of these items were expended either for original construction or "enlargement and improvement" of plant, each of them increasing the investment of the Commonwealth in the Institution. None of them were involved in its maintenance and operation, and under the authorities they were all extraordinary expenses and are therefore disallowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff that the aggregate sum of $80,661.94 was expended within the time prescribed by the Commonwealth in original construction and additions and "enlargement and improvement" of the plant of the Deaf, Dumb and Blind Institution, the details of which are specifically mentioned on pages 5, 6 and 7 of Joint Exhibit D. 1 (Rec., pp. 521-2-3).

Item 7—International Exchanges, $2,836.19.

This money was expended under the provisions of a statute of 1848 (App., pp. 185-6), which authorized an exchange between the United States and the French Government of various public documents. The act contemplates a continuation of such exchanges. It requires "a report annually to the joint committee of Library" indicating that a permanent annual exchange was contemplated by the Legislature.

I allow it as an ordinary expense, $2,836.19.

Item 8—Overpayment of Treasury notes, $50.

Nothing appears to show that this was a usual or customary expense or that it occurred more than once, or as to the circumstances under which it did occur. I infer that it was paid on the error of some officer, and it could hardly be assumed that such errors would become usual and customary.

I disallow the item.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff that the Commonwealth overpaid on Treasury notes within the time prescribed the sum of Fifty Dollars ($50).

Item 9—Printing Treasury Notes, $375.74.

This expense was incurred under the provisions of an Act passed in 1856 authorizing the issue of Treasury notes (App., pp. 186-187). The Act contemplated a permanent method of borrowing money by Treasury notes "issued from time to time." While an appropriation is made for only three years, there is nothing in the Act that indicates that its operation was to be confined to any limited period of time. It contemplates an indefinite continuation of the work provided for.

I allow the item as an ordinary expense, $375.74.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find at the request of the defendant that the Commonwealth paid within the time prescribed for printing Treasury notes under an Act passed in 1856, $375.74.

Item 10—Loss on account of counterfeit money, $190.

There is nothing in the record that discloses the circumstances under which the loss occurred, and I can only infer that it was one of the sporadic instances that might or might not occur in connection with a currency issued by the State. I cannot assume that such loss would be continuing, usual, or customary.

I disallow the item.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find at the request of the plaintiff that the Commonwealth lost within the time prescribed on account of counterfeit money $190.00.

Item 11—Virginia Military Institute, new buildings, etc., $151,000.00

The items making up this aggregate (found on pp. 524 and 525 Joint Ex. D-1, pp. 8 and 9) are all for the erection of and additions to, enlargements and improvements of, buildings connected with the Institute, and installing of heating and lighting plants and are within the rules laid down extraordinary expenses, and therefore disallowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiffs that the Commonwealth expended in the erection of buildings and additions thereto and enlargements and improvements, and installation of heating and lighting plants, connected with the Virginia Military Institute the sum of $151,000, the details of which appear on Joint Ex. D 1, pp. 8 and 9 within the time prescribed.

Item 12—University of Virginia, Repairs and Improvements to Buildings and Water Supply, $25,000.00.

This sum was expended for "repairing and improving the buildings thereof and for furnishing a supply of water for the protection and preservation of the said buildings and other valuable property of the said Institution" (p. 526 Joint Ex. D-1, p. 10).

Repairing the buildings would undoubtedly be an ordinary expense. The burden is upon the plaintiff to establish the ordinary expenses. Nothing is contained in the record that will enable me to ascertain what part of the $25,000 was expended for repairs, and in the absence of that information, no other course is open than to disallow the item, inasmuch as a portion of it at least is for an extraordinary expense. The analogy is very close between an item of this character and a case where a non-lien and a lien claim have been joined, in which case it is well settled that the introduction of the non-lien claim, reduces the whole claim to the character of a non-lien claim.

I therefore disallow the item.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff that the Commonwealth expended $25,- 000 in "repairing and improving the buildings and furnishing a supply of water for the protection and preservation of said buildings and other valuable property of the University of Virginia" within the time prescribed.

Item 13—Improvements Public Square, $1,456.91.

This item is admitted by the defendant.

Improvements Capitol Square, $12,278.47 (Rec. 528 Joint Ex. D-1, p. 12).

All of the items making up this aggregate appear to have been either for construction of additions to buildings, "enlargements or improvements," or installation of water and light plants, and the item is therefore disallowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff that the Commonwealth expended, within the time prescribed for additions to buildings, "enlargements or improvements" and installation of water and light plants, $12,278.47, the items of which appear on page 528 Joint Ex. D-1, p. 12.

Item 14—Fugitive Slave Expense and reward additional, $2,201.00.

This item is agreed to.

Item 15—Penitentiary Lot, New Hospital Building, etc., $13,947.48.

This item is made up of items for the erection of buildings, completing improvements, "enlargements and improvements," and installation of a water supply, and is disallowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative, at the request of the plaintiff, that the Commonwealth expended, within the time prescribed, the sum of $13,947.48 for the erection of buildings, completing improvements, and installation of water supply, the items of which appear on Rec. 529 Joint Ex. D-1, p. 13.

Item 16—Calling out militia at Wheeling in 1836, $1,099.

The militia appear to have been called out under the provisions of the Militia Law, and an Act was passed in 1838 (App., p. 222) giving them the "usual pay of the militia when in actual service." For the reasons hereafter given in connection with the Harpers Ferry Item, this item is allowed as an ordinary expense.

Item 17—Medical College of Virginia, additions and improvements to buildings, $25,000.

This was expended for enlarging the hospital and infirmary and extending the college buildings and for improvement and extension of the college museum, and was an "enlargement and improvement" (Rec., p. 530, Joint Ex. D-1, p. 14), and is an extraordinary expense and is therefore disallowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff that the Commonwealth expended $25,000 for "enlarging the hospital or infirmary, for extending the college buildings and for improvement and extension of the college museum" within the time prescribed.

Item 18—Attorney General's fees, prosecuting Selden Withers & Company, $500.

This item stands with an item "Selden Withers & Co. from Miscellaneous, $9,351.45," which with other items make the aggregate of item "23 Sundry B. P. W. expenses $36,728.50" (Sup. Ex. 10). It is conceded that the Selden Withers & Co. $9,351.45 was "a part of the expense of selling the bonds of the state." This item of $500 being of the same character, an advance fee for collecting the Selden Withers & Co. item, for the reasons given under item 5 as to maps for the Board of Public Works, is allowed.

Item 19—Eastern & Western Asylums, $344,295.57.

All of the items making up this aggregate (found on pp. 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537 and 538 of Rec. Joint Ex. D-1, pp. 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21 and 22) are for additional buildings and completing buildings and installing water plants with the exception of an item of $5,000 (Rec., p. 532; Ex. D-1, p. 16), and $7,450.01 (Rec., p. 538, Ex. D-1, p. 22) and are therefore in the nature of construction, additions to plant and increase of the investment of the state in the plants and are extraordinary expenses and therefore disallowed.

The item of $5,000 was expended under the Act of Feb. 14, 1844 (page 16, Chap. 11) which authorized an expenditure of $5,000 "for the purpose of remodelling and repairing the body of the old building."

Repairing is clearly an ordinary expense. Whether remodelling would be or not would depend upon the character of the work contemplated The second section of the Act provides:

> "that before the repairs mentioned in the preceding section shall be contracted for, &c."

apparently treating "remodelling and repairing" as repairs. As to this item, I think it is reasonable to conclude that the remodelling was in the nature of repairs and that the item is an ordinary expense, and I therefore allow it as such $5,000.00
The item "support" is admitted 7,450.01

With these exceptions the aggregate is disallowed.

The items of $7,000 on page 532, and $17,750 on page 533, include repairing among other items. It is impossible to separate the items of repair from the other items and they are disallowed for that reason.

Alternative Finding.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff under this item, that the Commonwealth expended within the time prescribed the aggregate of $331,845.56, for additional buildings, completing buildings and installing water plants.

Item 20—Gun House at Alexandria.... $900.00

Item 21—Cannon House, Surrey Co.... 110.00

Item 22—Cannon House for Richmond Artillery 1,079.09

These items are all for construction of buildings, the last two by virtue of special acts therefor (App., p. 246) are extraordinary expenses and are disallowed.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the plaintiff that the Commonwealth expended within the time prescribed for the purposes above indicated in the items 20, 21 and 22, the sum of $900, $110 and $1,079.09, respectively.

Item 23—Sundry Board of Public Works expenses $36,728.50

"Supplemental Ex. 10."

All of the items making up this sum appear to have been legitimate expenses of the Board of Public Works, reasonably and necessarily involved in the discharge of their duties and are therefore, for the reasons above given under Item 5 as to maps for the Board of Public Works, reasonably within the scope of the ordinary expenses of the Board of Public Works, and are to be treated as an ordinary expense of the State and are allowed.

Item 24—Aggregate, $18,574,747.84.

For the reasons heretofore given this item is allowed as an ordinary expense.

ALTERNATIVE FINDING.

I find in the alternative at the request of the defendant that the Commonwealth expended within the time prescribed for interest on its public debt the sum of $18,574,747.84.

HARPERS FERRY RAID.

The full amount of the expenditure for the Harpers Ferry Raid by the State of Virginia was the sum of $255,745.77. $3,982.12 should be credited to the expenditure for sundry returns, leaving the actual expenditure, $251,763.65. The question now to be determined is whether that is fairly within the scope of the term "ordinary expenses," as that term is used in the decree.

The Constitution of the United States recognizes the essential character of the militia (Con. Art. 1, sec. 8, part 15 and 16, Code of Va., 1860, p. 17). The Virginia Bill of Rights declares that a "well regulated militia * * * is the proper natural and safe defense of a free state." (Code Va., 1860, p. 34, sec. 13.) Virginia has had an active and expensive militia establishment since 1705 (do. 134 note). The Governor is authorized to "call forth the militia" when any > "combination whether for dismembering the State or establishing in any part of it a separate government, or for any other purpose shall become so powerful as to obstruct in any part of this state the due execution of the laws thereof."

Under the title head of "Public Defense" is found most extensive, detailed, and comprehensive statutory provisions providing for its organization, maintenance and control, occupying 45 pages of the statutes. (Code Va., 1860, page 134).

It provides for salaried officers (do. 142, sec. 27). For pay of certain officers (do. 148, sec. 8). For annual muster (do. 147, sec. 4); two trainings annually for "the officers of each County" (do. 147, sec. 4). For cavalry and artillery (do. page 151, sec. 11). "In case of any invasion or insurrection within the limits of any division * * * the commandant of such division" has power "to order out for the defense of the State the militia or any part thereof" (do. 161, sec. 1). "The officers and soldiers when called into the actual service of the State shall be entitled to the same camp equipage, pay, subsistence, forage and other emoluments to which similar officers and soldiers are entitled in the service of the United States." (do. page 164, sec. 14.)

The expense of this establishment was large, and the amount $1,030,594.11 is admitted to be an "ordinary expense."

It is clear that the militia is organized and maintained not for continuous active service but only that from time to time as occasion may require it may be called into "actual service." It is maintained for the express purpose of meeting exigencies the nature of which cannot be specifically foreseen. The possibility of the occurrence of the exigency is all that can justify the existence of the militia establishment. If the expense of maintaining the militia in order that a State may be prepared to meet the exigency when the occasion arises is an "ordinary expense," it is difficult to see why the expense involved in meeting the exigency itself, thus provided for, the accomplishing of the sole purpose of the militia, is not also within the fair scope of an "ordinary expense." It is a legitimate part of the whole expense of the militia establishment. Its expenses should be treated as a whole. That the appropriations were made "for the defense of the Commonwealth" has no significance as showing that they were unusual or extraordinary. This language was no doubt used, not for the purpose of indicating that the Harpers Ferry Raid was unusual or extraordinary and beyond the scope of the militia's duties, but for the purpose of referring the appropriation to that branch of the public service which the legislature had technically designated the "Public Defense." That the Harpers Ferry Raid was signalized by important and far reaching consequences without precedent in the history of the State, and impossible of duplication, does not differentiate it from other, and less significant exigencies, that may have occurred or that might be expected to occur. It is not the cause, but the result of the exigency, which obstructs "in any part of this State the due execution of the laws thereof," and that "renders it necessary to invoke the militia." The Harpers Ferry Raid, was then, an exigency which might ordinarily occur, which was clearly within the contemplation of the legislature when it created and maintained the militia, one of the specific things for which the annual expenditures were made, and I think it is for these reasons, within the fair meaning of the decree an "ordinary expense," and the sum of $251,763.65 is therefore allowed as such.

Primary Schools.

The amount expended on account of primary schools was $3,056,239.84 (Rec. p. 538-H). Of this amount thus expended, the defendant admits that the sum of $655,908.73 stated by them as "paid from capitation tax" is an ordinary expense and should be so charged. They deny that the balance of $2,400,331.11 is so chargeable for the reason that it was derived from other sources than the capitation tax or "on account of the source from which it was derived" (Rec. p. 515-D-1, p. 1; 538 H. Deft.'s Ex. D-2, p. 7).

The "Literary Fund" from which these expenditures were made came from three sources; First,

> "all money, stocks or other property which now or hereafter may belong to the Literary Fund" (App., p. 207);

Second,

> "Whatever shall accrue to the State from escheats, forfeitures or fines (except militia fines) from the estate of a decedent of which there is no other distributee or from any other property as derelict and having no other owner" (Code Va. 1849—App., p. 207).

Third, The auditor of public accounts was required by law to > "set apart and pay into the Treasury to the credit of the Literary Fund for the purposes of education in primary and free schools, the amount of the capitation tax for the preceding year" (Act, March 25, 1853, App., p. 208).

From the fund thus created there was expended, $45,000.; $70,000., $75,000 and $80,000 annually (Code Va. 1860, pp. 416-7 note).

I have already held, under a preceding paragraph, that an expenditure for this purpose was an ordinary expense, and not an "expenditure." It is conceded that as to $655,908.73, that conclusion is correct, because it was "paid from the capitation tax."

I find nothing in the legislation or in the decree that sustains this distinction. The sum of $655,908.73 was not "paid from the capitation tax." Under the express provision of the Statute, the capitation tax was paid "into the Treasury to the credit of the Literary Fund", and when it arrived in the Treasury it was mingled with all the other funds that were the property of the "Literary Fund." It is only the amount of the capitation tax that is paid out of the Treasury for the purposes of education. There are no earmarks upon the capitation tax by which it can be traced into the Treasury, and then out of the Treasury, as a disbursement for educational purposes. The provision as to the capitation tax is not an appropriation of the tax per se, but is simply a provision on the part of the state determining the minimum amount that shall be contributed annually from the revenues raised by taxation to the Literary Fund, to supplement the first and second sources of income. The amount to be spent "for the purpose of education" was by no means limited to the "amount of the capitation tax." It exceeded it by the amount of $2,400,331.11. These three sources of income when they reached the Treasury constituted a common fund known as the "Literary Fund." Out of that common fund all of the disbursements were made for the purposes of education. The decree does not authorize me to inquire into the source from which the money reached the Treasury, and determine the amount of the ordinary expenses expended from this fund, by the amount of any particular source from which the fund derived its revenue. If one dollar expended for primary schools from the "Literary Fund" made up from these various contributions, is an ordinary expense, I can see no reason why every dollar coming from the same fund, and expended for the same purpose, is not also an "ordinary expense."

I therefore find that the sum of $3,056,239.84 is an ordinary expense. Inasmuch as the sum of $655,908.73 has already been included among the items which make up $18,207,684.29, there is to be added to it in order to charge $3,056,239.84 as an ordinary expense the difference between that sum and $655,908.73 or $2,400,331.11.

Alternative Finding.

I find, at the request of the defendant, as an alternative finding, that the amount of the capitation tax during the period in which the sum of $3,056,239.84 was expended for schools was $655,908.73.

Surveys.

I have already held under Paragraph III, that the sum of $106,983.67 expended for surveys by the Board of Public Works was general in its character, and should be charged as an ordinary expense and the item is here so charged $106,983.67.

I find that the method adopted by the plaintiff of, ascertaining "the average total population", is the closest and most accurate approximation upon which the ordinary expenses can be apportioned to "the average total population", as the object to be ascertained, is the population in existence, at the time the ordinary expenses to be apportioned, were paid, and I therefore adopt the plaintiff's method.

PARAGRAPH V OF DECREE.

5. "AND ALSO ON THE BASIS OF THE FAIR ESTIMATED VALUATION OF THE PROPERTY, REAL AND PERSONAL, BY COUNTIES, OF THE STATE OF VIRGINIA."

This paragraph is clearly in the alternative with the last clause of Paragraph IV. That paragraph requires "such proportion of the ordinary expenses * * * on the basis of the total average population," and Paragraph V. "also on the basis of the fair estimated valuation," two alternatives, each predicated upon the same "ordinary expenses." How any proportion of the ordinary expenses can be predicated upon a valuation that is not coterminous with the "ordinary expenses", but taken two and a half years later under a profound change in conditions, affecting the amount of that valuation, can serve any useful purpose in apportioning such "ordinary expenses" it is difficult to see. If an ordinary expense is a charge upon valuation, it can only be a charge upon the valuation in existence at the time the "ordinary expense" is incurred, and not upon another and entirely different valuation at a later period. The case has, however, been tried upon the hypothesis that the "fair estimated valuation," is as of June 20, 1863, and while I think January 1, 1861 is the true date, I will first find the fair estimated valuation on June 20, 1863. Both parties start with the assessed valuation of real estate made in 1856, and which it was provided by Acts passed March 27, 1862 and March 28, 1863 "shall be permanent and not be changed" for those years respectively (App. p. 133). The taxes were assessed as of February 1

(Code of Va. 1860, p. 197, sec. 48) (Acts Genl. Assembly, 1863, Chap. 1, p. 1). The rate of assessment in '61 (See Plff. Ex. H-1) was at the rate of forty cents on a hundred. The Act of 1863 increased the rate of taxation to 100 cents on a hundred and generally, one hundred and fifty per cent. The Act of 1862 contained no provisions as to changing the assessment of real estate. The Act of 1863, sec. 91, provided that

> "as many tracts of land and lots with improvements thereon situate in counties invaded by the public enemy have been permanently diminished in value by said invasion and despoiled and reduced in value by military occupation and by the waste and violence incident to war, it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the Revenue for such counties upon the requisition of the owner of any real property situate in such counties or of his agent to make a new assessment of such real property upon the following basis and mode of valuation, viz.: The commissioner shall deduct from the amount at which such property stands assessed at its last assessment such sum as is equal to a fair estimate of the permanent diminution in the value thereof caused by the invasion of such county and of the permanent injury and damage inflicted upon such property by military occupation thereof and the waste and violence incident to war" (App. pp. 133-4).

and then follows a provision that the > "permanent diminution, injury and damage" should be measured by the "standard and rate of valuation" as if it had "been estimated during the year 1856," the remainder to be the valuation to be assessed. The change of valuation could be made only "upon the requisition of the owner." The defendant claims that it is to be presumed that the owner made the application where there was any diminution in value for that cause and that as to the counties actually subjected to "military occupation" the presumption is that the assessors valuation for 1863 represents the actual value after these proceedings had been had. The law provided also for adding to or taking from the assessment on the addition or loss of buildings (Code of Va. 1860, chap. 35, secs. 31, 32, 33 & 34, pp. 193-4). Nothing appeared in the case to indicate that any requsitions had been made by owners for a reduction in value under the provisions of Sec. 91. If there is a presumption that the requisitions were made and the values were correspondingly reduced under the provisions of this section, that presumption is overcome by the fact that the valuation of real estate for 1863, was $378,534,712.35 (Rec. p. 639—Ex. E-1, p. 1) as against a valuation for 1861 $317,330,219.26 (Plffs. Ex. H-1, p. 647), and valuation for 1860 of, $377,947,112 (do.).

It will be seen that the valuations for 1863 and 1860 are substantially the same. While the valuation for '63 exceeds that given for 1861, it should be noted that quite a number of counties were omitted in 1861 which were valued in 1863 at about $36,000,000, which added to $317,330,229.26 would make an aggregate of $353,330,229.36, so that the valuation of real estate in 1863 instead of being reduced as it inevitably would have been if there had been any diminution on the requisition of the owners, shows substantially the same value as in 1860 and an increase over 1861.

The assessments as stated in the schedules for Virginia and West Virginia stand therefore unaffected by any of the considerations growing out of the war conditions on June 20, 1863, and are practically the assessments of 1856.

The plaintiff claims that because of the fact that the real estate was within the limits of the Confederacy, whose territory was to a large extent the theatre of active war, occupied by contending armies, had been ravaged and in part destroyed, with agriculture and manufactures practically paralyzed, there was a depreciation of its value by at least fifty per cent in all of Virginia and the same in the counties of Berkeley, Greenbrier, Hampshire, Hardy, Jefferson, Mercer, Monroe, Morgan, Pendleton and Pocahontas in West Virginia (Rec., p. 640, Ex. E-1, p. 2).

If this contention is sustained the "fair estimated valuation of the real property of Virginia" would be $148,042,730.15; and in West Virginia, $67,676,127.44. To establish this, they rely upon the general presumption that a marked decrease in value would result from the war conditions, the opinions of witnesses and the sale of different parcels of real estate.

My attention has been called to cases tending to show that the assessments are admissible as tending to show the value of real and personal property at the time of the assessment. Inasmuch as each party relies upon the assessment as the basis of their respective valuations, and there is no other evidence in the case, and no other is probably obtainable, that tends to show the value of the real and personal property as a whole at the time in question, I shall treat the assessments as one of the competent elements for the purpose of determining the fair estimated valuation.
